When the Civil War broke out, Lieutenant Howard was at West Point as Assistant Professor of Mathematics. When appointed Colonel of the Third Maine Infantry, on the nomination of Honorable James G. Blaine, then speaker of the Maine legislature, he bade good-by to his wife and two children and was soon on the way to Washington with a regiment of a thousand strong. The account of his first battle, Bull Run, and, the following spring, of his campaigning and fighting, in command of a brigade, with McClellan on the Virginia peninsula, are given more in detail as to the minor incidents than his descriptions of more famous battles, and possess great interest for the general reader. It was at Fair Oaks that Howard lost his right arm. Before the expiration of his leave of ninety days, he was back to the army and commanded the rear guard in a night march, after the Second Bull Run battle. In the next great battle, Antietam, he was promoted during the fight, to the command of a division consisting of three brigades—a Major General's command—succeeding General Sedgwick, who was wounded. It was this Second Division of the Second Corps that Howard led at Fredericksburg. The Seventh Michigan Infantry answered with a cheer Howard's call for volunteers to cross the river in boats, with the enemy in rifle pits on the opposite banks. This they accomplished successfully, and made prisoners of some rebels who remained too long in the trenches.

Soon after this terrible battle, having been promoted to Major-General, Howard was assigned by request of Hooker, then commanding the Army of the Potomac, to the Eleventh Corps. At the disastrous battle of Chancellorsville, his corps was on the extreme right, and both the corps and its commander have been blamed for the loss of the battle. Those who read the frank statement of the situation given in this book, in which it is shown that 8,000 in position were attacked by more than 26,000 under Stonewall Jackson, cannot wonder at the result, which no amount of precaution could have changed. But it is very noticeable that Howard in no instance seeks to exculpate himself by casting blame upon another or upon the troops.

At Gettysburg, soon after the battle began, Reynolds, in command of a wing consisting of three corps, was killed, and Howard, as the ranking officer, came into command of the field. For his selection of the military position on Cemetery Ridge and stubbornly beating back a force of the

AROUND THE HOME HEARTH

By Margaret E. Sangster

Country Girls and Business Life

THOUSANDS of girls brought up in the country, when they reach the age of eighteen or twenty, turn longing eyes to the city. There are no business opportunities in the home village. They have availed themselves of the district school, and very likely have been graduated from the nearest high school, often straining the family finances to reach this point of vantage. A high school diploma is a certificate that enables a girl, who is clever and quick-witted, either to go on to future educational heights or to prepare herself at once for a business career. A gifted and ambitious girl with scholarly tastes and large perseverance, may determine to work her way through college with little outside help. The thing is difficult, but it has been done by country girls, and will be done again. Nor need city girls be left out of such an enrollment. When, however, there is little money on which to count and parental resources have been taxed to the uttermost, when perhaps there are younger children still to be educated, or others who can assist the mother in domestic life, it is not surprising that a conscientious girl resolves, since she cannot find business where she is, to go where there are presumably numerous openings. A vast army of young women leave their homes in the early morning in every town and city to seek the factory, the shop, the counting-room or the office, where they give hours of work to earn a weekly wage.

Spending a night several years ago at a deaconess' home downtown in New York, I was impressed in the early morning before it was fully light by the tramp, tramp of the brave procession of young girls starting on their day's work. The procession began at half-past six, and it was forging ahead steadily until nine. The girl in business is a familiar figure and a thoroughly respectable and respected one. In a multitude of instances she is a girl away from her own home boarding or living in a lodging, saving a share of her earnings to send to her people, herself an object lesson in love's sweet altruism.

When a country girl begins to think of coming to town, her first step should be to ascertain before leaving her home what are her chances for securing paying work in her special line, and what safe shelter she may depend upon until she can begin to earn money. A penniless girl should never seek the city unless she has friends to whom she can go, and with whom she may stay. Unless she has a position pledged, she would better remain on the farm or in the village, among those who have known her from childhood.

Supposing that a girl has neither kindred nor acquaintances in the city of her desire, how shall she proceed, and what initiative shall she take before burning her ships? As a rule, her first proceeding should be to write a letter to the Young Women's Christian Association, asking for a list of boarding houses within her means, and procuring the advice of the resident secretary as to her finding something to do. The same counsel may be given to an art student or a girl with a voice that she wishes to cultivate, or a talent for the piano that seems worth higher instruction than can be had at home. One of the friendly offices of the Young Women's Christian Association is to look after girls who are strangers and give them sisterly aid until they are able to stand on their own feet. A letter of introduction from the country pastor to a minister of one's own denomination in the city is also an excellent thing to have. As soon as possible, after reaching a strange city in which she expects to spend months or years, a young woman should establish herself in a church home. In every large city there are churches that extend cordial hands of welcome to young people who are absent from home and friends. Let no one make you believe that city churches have room only for the rich and influential. It is not so. The spirit of Christ permeates his church, and any young woman who enters a church, makes herself known to a pastor, attends services regularly and joins a Sunday School class or a Christian Endeavor Circle, will, before very long, find herself in a warm atmosphere of friendship and good will.

The problem of living is an intensely difficult one in the city, and a girl dependent on her own earnings must reckon very closely if she is to keep within her income, avoid debt, save a little, and, it may be, assist her dear ones. Girls often find it well to live in a co-operative fashion—two or three uniting to pay the rent of a lodging where, if they choose, they may prepare their own breakfast. They often find that it is

A Princess who Trains her Children

PRINCESS FREDERIC CHARLES of Hesse recently created somewhat of a sensation in European court circles by announcing that she purposed having her two little sons (shown in the photograph) trained "like American business men," so that their future might not be dependent on royal "allowances." The little princes are amply provided for, but their mother means that they shall be of some use in the world, and not mere lay figures. They are to have an all-round business education, supplemented by foreign travel. She has a great admiration for Americans.

Art students, journalists, stenographers and others whose weekly salary or income from their work warrants the outlay combine in what may be called girl colonies. An apartment may be taken by eight or ten young women who share expenses, and a mother or elder sister coming from a home that can spare her will chaperone the entire party, keep house, do the catering, and in every way act as matron and caretaker for the busy girls. Every sort of device is utilized in these cases to economize space, and the droll makeshifts to which the girls resort, that their home may be pretty and attractive, witness the ingenuity and artistic skill dormant in almost every woman. They are obliged to calculate very closely, not only as to space, but as to expenses. But they seldom fail to show a satisfactory balance sheet at the end of a year.

In Times of Discouragement

SEASONS of discouragement may be the portion of the most optimistic, because no one can control destiny, and trouble of some sort is certain, sooner or later, to invade every life. The way in which one meets trouble is an unerring test of character. Temperament, as well as character, must be taken into account when one is confronted with trouble, either actual or imaginary. The fact is that depression and melancholy much oftener follow in the wake of fancied distress than of real calamity. One cannot fight a fog as one fights a foe that one meets in the open. When the discouraged mood settles down grimly on the soul, the best plan is as soon as possible to get into the out-door air, take exercise and change the scene. Reason has little to do with this state of things, and is powerless to combat it successfully. Three times out of four there is physical derangement to which the low mood is due. When the brain does not supply the requisite nervous force to assist the stomach in assimilating food, man or woman alike may be a victim of the blues. If one can possibly help it, he should not inflict the torture of his mood of depression on the family. Resolutely to present a cheerful face to the world, concealing whatever disturbance may lurk in the soul, is often the best way of routing the enemy and becoming of good cheer. The effort to look, act and speak as if everything were right brings about the desired result. We should try to remember that the bright days in life far exceed the dark ones, that the smooth road is longer than the rough, and that just around the next corner some unexpected pleasure, some happy turn of fortune may be waiting for us. Then, too, the best panacea for discouragement is the knowledge that God's care of us is never intermitted, and that God's promises are forever sure. "Fear not, little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." What does this mean if not that you are to be victorious in the end over circumstances, moods and tenses, time and tide? There is nothing a child of God can possibly want that God cannot send to enrich that child's heart and life. Let the seasons of discouragement pass away in the sunshine of the Father's love.

Who Carries the Heavier End?

The question came up not long ago in a circle of friends, and is now offered for discussion by the editor of this page, Who carries the heavier end—the farmer or the farmer's wife? The man has on his mind and hands the labor of the farm, the ploughing and the planting, the sowing and the reaping, the redemption of barren acres, the cutting down of timber, the clearing away of stone and the care of stock. Often enough he finds it no easy task to carry on his part of the business profitably. But the wife, with fewer labor-saving contrivances than he, has the round of indoor cares, the training of the children, the cooking, sewing and mending; in summer the preparation of food for hired men, in winter a routine that keeps her busy from dawn till long after dusk. Frank letters and expressions of opinion are requested from the farmer and the farmer's wife. They may be addressed to the editor of the Family Page, CHRISTIAN HERALD. Write on one side only of the paper.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

N. Y. Z. The incompatibility between the husband and wife you mention may not be vital, and their differences may be reconciled if no third party intervenes. To step in between husband and wife and advise either to leave the other is a serious matter. If you have a real regard for your friend you will cease giving her advice that may lead her into a course she may regret all her life.

M. P. R. While your children are so young you would better tell them stories than read to them. I advise Bible stories and fairy tales. You should try to cultivate the imagination by the latter, and teach truth and wisdom by the former.

JESUS, THE LIGHT OF MEN

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

JESUS the Light of Childhood. He, the only begotten Son of his Father, who had been in heaven since before the world was made; he who had shared in the making of this world, for we are told that "without him was not anything made," even he left his high estate, and so humbled himself that he came down to earth to live among men, being born of a woman.

Mary was that mother mild
And Jesus Christ that little child.

The Divine became a child, that a child might become almost divine. His birth in Bethlehem wrought a great change in the estimate of the child. Hitherto the elder or the Pharisee had been the ideal, but Jesus set a child in the midst, saying, "Except ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." And from that hour the whole fabric of childhood was changed.

Roman parents, perhaps the most cultured parents in the world, were guilty of the grossest cruelty to their new-born children, even abandoning them by carrying them to the Velabrum, a district in Rome, near Mount Aventine, where they were left to die, or to be gathered up by ill-disposed people, who maimed them by curving their backs or shortening their limbs, in order to use them as beggars. "That workshop of human misfortunes, those that was what the Velabrum was. When the influence of Christ was felt, and Christianity began to hold sway, this crime against innocents was abated. Constantine, the first Christian Emperor, put forth a proclamation to turn parents from using a murderous hand on their new-born children, and to dispose their hearts to the best sentiments. And the "abandoned" children were gathered from the Velabrum to be brought up honestly; foundling hospitals were established. Later, houses of mercy for children were founded by Justinian, and gradually all sorts of charities for the welfare of children have been developed, such as aid societies, creches, kindergartens, hospitals for children, schools for defective children, reformatory institutions, etc. It is the far-reaching influence of the fact that Christ was born in Bethlehem.

Jesus the Light of Evangelists. John was the herald of Jesus, going to the river side where he knew men would congregate to hear the voice of one proclaiming a message. They came, and he prepared their hearts to receive the Son of God. And ever since those days there have been evangelists, as Whitefield and Moody, and others, who are even now earnestly at work in this manner, because John the Baptist led the way.

Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, one of the prominent evangelists of our day, says: "The evangel proclaims the Lordship of Christ; secondly, the cross of Christ; thirdly, the resurrection of Christ, and, finally, an indwelling Christ by the Holy Spirit."

Jesus the Light of the Church. The Church of the living God had its beginning when Andrew and John went with Jesus to where he was abiding, and sat under his teaching the livelong day. The church began to grow when the two men went out to seek their brothers to bring them under the influence of Jesus. And it grew still more the next day when Philip and Nathaniel were added to their number. "Is it a strong congregation?" asked a man respecting a body of worshippers. "Yes," was the reply. "How many members are there?" "Seventy-six." "Seventy-six! Are they so very wealthy?" "No, they are poor." "How, then, do you say it is a strong church?" "Because," said the gentleman, "they are earnest, devoted, at peace, loving each other, and striving together to do the Master's work. Such a congregation is strong, whether composed of a dozen or five hundred members!" And he spoke the truth.

A Reservoir of Blessings

The church may be likened to a great reservoir, from which streams of blessing flow to the whole world, not alone spiritual blessings, but the comforts and advantages of civilization: better homes, the knowledge of sanitation, improved methods of work and commerce, better laws and safety of life. There is an abiding Pentecostal condition in the world, because of the activities of the church.

Jesus the Light of Honest Dealing. He cast out of the temple the money changers and those who sold doves, because they were making it a den of thieves. Christianity has become the searchlight to discomfit and scatter all sorts of dishonest dealers. Stupendous frauds called "grafts" have been exposed in our own land and others, and a check put upon them. Jesus put his seal upon the punishment of offenders when he drove the thieves out of the temple.

God's Great Family

Jesus the Light of Christian Missions. Jesus laid the plan of salvation clearly before Nicodemus, but it was not for Nicodemus alone, nor for the Jews alone, but for the whole world. Said the Bishop of Ripon: "All classes, races and conditions are God's, no matter with what color the colder or warmer sun may have touched their faces, no matter in what tongue they express their sorrows, no matter what sad hereditary taint may have descended upon them, no matter what low, groveling superstitions may be their intellectual inheritance, no matter in what squalid circumstances they may be living, no matter in what dark surroundings their character may be formed, no matter what degradation civilization or the want of civilization may have imposed upon them, all are God's by right of the prophetic declaration, 'All souls are mine.'" And so Christ is the light of Christian missions. At the ancient city of Rhodes there was a colossal statue set up in honor of Apollo. It was the figure of a man bestriding the harbor, of so great size that vessels passed between its legs. In one hand there was placed a light for the guidance of mariners, in the other there was a sword as a warning to invaders.

"A light to lighten the Gentiles and the glory of thy people"

Jesus is the colossal figure of all ages. He is, himself, the beacon light for all mankind, but in his hand he bears no sword; instead, his hand is raised to bless the world. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

Jesus the Light of Hope for Women. Jesus met the sinful woman of Samaria at the well, and brought her out of her evil life, and made her a blessing to her fellow townspeople. Out of this incident have grown Doors of Hope, refuges for fallen women, Florence Crittenden Homes, etc. Eighteen years ago, in the province of Anhui, a little girl was born at the season when the poppy fields were at the height of their scarlet glory. From some fancy, born of the season, the mother named her Ang Kwei, the "Spirit of the Poppy." Year by year in those far-away fields, two wonders grew—the wonder of the poppy's delicate beauty, and the wonder of the child's grace and form. Sometimes the mother, looking from her husband's dull face to the dainty features of the child, would murmur, "Strange."

And as the child grew older, the father would now and then say to the mother, "We should be able to marry her well, for she is good to look at." When Ang Kwei was fifteen, she was suddenly transplanted. The poison from the wounded poppy stems had stained first her father's fingers, then his lips, and at last his heart. He sold his beautiful little Ang Kwei for sixty dollars, to a stranger from the distant city of Shanghai. In the month when thousands of hands were busy gathering gain from the broken poppies in the field, this life was gathered in by greedy hands, also to be broken in the service of sin. The mother of Ang Kwei was so anxious about her daughter, that from her little earnings she presently saved enough to go to Shanghai. She found the girl in Foochow Road, where the mother, clad in the coarsest of garments, clasped to her heart the beautiful young girl in her satins and jewels.

"Mother, take me home!" was the burning cry of the daughter. But they would not let her go, because they could sell her for one thousand dollars. At last some one said, "Why do you not go to the Tsi Liang Soo (The Door of Hope)? They rescue girls like Ang Kwei." Again Ang Kwei was transplanted—this time to the Door of Hope, and to a soil which God had prepared. Ang Kwei's sweet face grew lovelier, her gentle ways more gracious, as silently but deeply God worked within, until into the bruised and broken life came the transforming power of a new life from above, making again, after the desire of God's heart, that which sin had marred.

Two years passed, when a still broader Door of Hope opened for her into the heart and home of an earnest Christian young man, with whom she is sharing a happy life of service in God's work.

Jesus the Leader of Young Men

Jesus is Light for Young Men. He healed the nobleman's son by power of his word. We have only to examine into the great Y. M. C. A. movement to know what the influence of Jesus has accomplished for young men. It is thus that the manliness of Jesus is emphasized for the uplift of young men in physical and spiritual energies side by side.

The Light of Jesus for the Sick. The impotent man at the pool of Bethesda had been without hope for thirty-eight years. And when he came in contact with Jesus, one sentence was enough to give him perfect health. The work of healing has not ceased. Witness the hospitals for the insane, for emergency cases, for incurables, for cripples, for lepers, most of them founded and sustained by Christian benevolence.

Jesus is Light to the Hungry. "Whence shall we buy bread that these may eat?" asked Jesus of his apostles, as he looked at the multitude of people, five thousand and more, who had hung upon his words and upon his healing the livelong day. Can any person, who is poor and hungry, ever think that Jesus is indifferent to his condition? Two little children in a garret were found nearly at the point of starvation, but they were trustful, and said to the kind strangers who had brought them food, "God always seems to hear us when we scrape the bottom of the barrel." In His Name free breakfasts are given to the hungry school children, and Sunday morning breakfasts to poor men to whom the Bible is read as they eat; dinners, too, are provided on holidays; diet kitchens are established for the sick poor; none of these things would be in existence but for the light and love of Christ.

Jesus is Light to Those Who Hunger and Thirst After Righteousness. How many churches in the town or city where you live? How many churches in all the world? If we can tell the number of the stars, we can also tell the number of the churches. Every church is a house of bread, of the Bread of Life. Not all to whom Jesus offered the Bread of Life that day in Capernaum really wanted it. There are many to-day like-minded. In a certain first-class boarding house there were sixty-three boarders. A pastor called there to see one of his members, and asked the question: How many people in this house attend church? "Only my husband and myself," was the reply.

Jesus is Light to the Blind. One Sabbath day, as Jesus was entering the temple, he healed a man who had been blind from his birth. A few hours later, he performed even a greater miracle upon the same man by opening the eyes of his soul, when he recognized his benefactor as the Son of God and worshiped him.

Not so encompassed by the night are they
Whose sealed eyes ne'er look upon the day,
As those who view the miracle of morn
And hold the Marvel-maker's name in scorn.

CLINTON SCOLLARD.

A blind Milton writing the sublime poem of the ages, and blind Fanny Crosby, writing hundreds of hymns, are illustrious examples of the Light which Jesus is to the blind.

A WOMAN IN THE PULPIT

Mrs. Varney's Pastoral Work at Paw Paw, Mich.

PEOPLE who do not believe it is practicable for a woman to have a career and still be loved devotedly by her husband, will be interested to know about the Rev. and Mrs. Charles E. Varney. Since their marriage nearly twelve years ago, Mr. Varney has been her tutor and he has trained her for the ministry. He went with her to college until she obtained her degree of B.D. Being a scholarly man and a hard student, he has always ex-became interested in the Christian Church in Paw Paw, Mich. They filled the pulpit Sundays, and when the time came for Mr. Varney to start out on his lecture work, the church invited Mrs. Varney to officiate as minister. Being much attracted by the young people, who showed an unusually beautiful Christian spirit, Mrs. Varney accepted the call. She and her little ten-year-old boy took up their residence in Paw Paw, and she began her work in October. In three months, the little church has grown rapidly. At a recent meeting, nearly fifty were added to the membership.

Mrs. Varney is original in the pulpit and in pastoral work. After school hours her home is full of children and young people. She plays with the children or helps the young people with lessons and essays. She is either the youngest or the oldest, as the social condition demands. Her pulpit work is always womanly, yet strong and dramatic. Mrs. Varney's theory is that whatever one's gift is, it should be consecrated to the highest ends. Her simple emotional power is especially revealed in her lecture, "The Life of Christ." At Christmas time she persuaded the class of young people to forego the pleasure of exchanging presents and to respect the great gift of God by giving to the work of Christ. This class presented the church with a bouquet of green paper leaves, with thirty-one roses made of one-dollar bills. Other classes followed and the result was a large Christmas gift to the work.

pected his wife to read all that he reads and to acquire intellectually all that he acquires.

Finding that his own true place was probably on the lecture platform, Mr. Varney entered that field, and has done a gratifying year's work; but in the midst of his success, he never for a moment forgot his wife's work and his ambitions for her. Last summer, while they were spending the summer at Eagle Lake, Mich., they

Classes in Public Speaking

MANY readers of this journal are taking advantage of the opportunity (announced in a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD) to send in their names for enrolment as students in the classes now being formed by Rev. Dr. E. J. Haynes, "the Tremont Temple orator," who is one of the best practical instructors in the art of public speaking now before the American public.

Dr. Haynes' method is a personal one, and is conducted wholly by mail. No one need know you are practising it. It is the condensed experience of thirty-five years. Speaking of his method, Dr. Haynes says to students: "There cannot be the remotest doubt of success, if you will give your attention, nor need the study interfere with the exactions of the busiest life. The first lesson lays down the general principles of the art of clear speaking. The second lesson is of great service in adding to the grace of conversation. The verbiage, the accent, the moderation of tone, the enunciation with which a person speaks, betray refinement or the reverse. It is a more certain index than the dress, and, indeed, often gives the lie to the dress. The succeeding lessons cover the whole ground, step by step. There are ten lessons in all, and if the student gives reasonable attention, he or she will quickly acquire the much-wished-for power of standing up and speaking in public without confusion of ideas or hesitancy of utterance, whenever occasion demands. Indeed, I may say with absolute truthfulness, that the ordeal of speaking, either at a friendly gathering at home, at dinners, luncheons or receptions, at clubs, circles or societies, in church meetings, or from the platform at formal assemblages, can be and should be, not a pain, but a genuine pleasure. This is the revelation my method makes to those who take it up as a study."

To those who are backward in taking part in gatherings where speaking is to be done, this course of training will be a timely opportunity for acquiring just what is needed to give skill in address, clear and distinct utterance, and that self-possession which is more than half the battle for young speakers. Every man and woman, young or old, can acquire this gift by a series of simple graded studies which meet every difficulty. Timidity, shyness and self-consciousness vanish as soon as the practical training begins to be grasped by the student.

All who wish to enrol in the classes now forming, should address Dr. E. J. Haynes, care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York.

THE DOCTOR'S GIFT

Food Worth its Weight in Gold.

We usually expect the doctor to put us on some kind of penance and give us bitter medicines.

A Penn. doctor brought a patient something entirely different and the results are truly interesting.

"Two years ago," writes this patient, "I was a frequent victim of acute indigestion and biliousness, being allowed to eat very few things. One day our family doctor brought me a small package, saying he had found something for me to eat at last."

"He said it was a food called Grape-Nuts, and even as its golden color might suggest, it was worth its weight in gold. I was sick and tired trying one thing after another to no avail, but at last consented to try this new food."

"Well! it surpassed my doctor's fondest anticipation, and every day since then I have blessed the good doctor and the inventor of Grape-Nuts."

I noticed improvement at once, and in a month's time my former spells of indigestion had disappeared. In two months I felt like a new man. My brain was much clearer and keener, my body took on the vitality of youth, and this condition has continued."

"There's a Reason." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Use ordinary soap for ordinary purposes; Ivory Soap for better-than-ordinary purposes.

That is the rule in most households; and it is a good rule.

Take, for example, a garment such as is shown in the illustration. It is too valuable, too dainty, too fragile to be cleansed with any other than Ivory Soap.

The same remark holds good in the case of a hundred other articles—colored goods, wash silks, lawns, dimities, curtains, etc. The safest, best, and only right way to launder them is with Ivory Soap.

There is no "free" (uncombined) alkali in Ivory Soap. That is why it will not injure the finest fabric or the most delicate skin.

JIM'S MOTHER

By MADAME DU BOIS

"I JUST can't do it!" Helen Sothorn sat listlessly looking out of the window, with her hands in her lap. Her pretty face was drawn and wet with tears. It seemed to her as though the death-knell of all her hopes had been sounded.

The day was a gray one; the sky wore that leaden aspect which is typical of early November, and seemed to throw a depressing mantle over her once joyous heart.

Helen and James Sothorn had been married six months and the first shadow had now come between them—the first war of words. James had gone to his office in town this morning with an anxious, careworn face, carrying with him the vision of his wife's tearful eyes and quivering lips. He was miserable all day, knowing he had brought the first cloud into their lives.

After bravely doing her morning work, Helen tried to eat her luncheon, but left it unfinished on the table and went to her little, low rocking chair by the front window to try and think it out. After an hour of sad reflection she turned to her work-basket and tried to sew on those bits of things that were so full of meaning and intense joy. After an unsuccessful attempt at singing over her work, the weight of her misery was so great that she flung herself down on the couch, hid her face in the pillows and sobbed. Supposing herself alone, she sobbed out just what was in her heart.

She did not hear the rap on the door, nor notice the entrance of her neighbor, who came in just in time to hear her cry: "No, I just can't do it!"

Here was a choice bit of gossip, indeed! Sarah Gadabout had not heard anything like it since Mrs. Simpson's husband went off with his "affinity." Here was a bride of six months in tears and open rebellion over something, and she must not leave the house until she found out what.

"Ahem!"

Helen did not hear her.

"Ahem!" a little louder.

Helen hastily rose in confusion and apologized for her appearance by saying that she did not feel well. Sarah Gadabout knew that she was not telling the exact truth; but Helen did not know that the intruder had been in the room long enough to have heard what she said.

"What ails ye, Helen?"

"Oh, a slight headache," she replied.

"Seems to me you do take on dreadful, when you have a slight headache," sarcastically.

Then, as no reply was forthcoming, she added:

"I thought I heard you tell the minister's wife that you never had a headache in your life."

Realizing that she was cornered, but having no intention of telling the village gossip her troubles, Helen said:

"We are all apt to exaggerate. I should have said, rarely; maybe I did. Are you sure you heard exactly what I did say?"

"Dead sure! I took particular notice, because, says I to myself, that girl don't look over rugged, and I believe she's puttin' on about her fine health; we'll just wait an' see."

Helen tried to turn the subject; but Sarah had no intention of having it turned, and continued to annoy the sufferer, who finally said very firmly:

"Sarah, dear, you must pardon me; but I really do not wish to discuss the matter. I gave way to some unpleasant thoughts, but I feel that private matters should only be talked over between husband and wife; in fact, James and I agreed to this before we were married."

Finding that all her coaxing ended in flat failure, Sarah Gadabout went away. To the first person she met she said, breathlessly:

"Have you heard the news?"

"No. What is it?"

"Why, Mr. and Mrs. Sothorn have had their first quarrel."

"No! You don't mean it! And they such a loving couple, too!"

"Yes," said Sarah, "I found her in tears and declarin' that she just could not do something or other. I couldn't find out what, though I tried hard enough, goodness knows! I knew you would want to know all about it. You don't suppose she's goin' to put poison in his coffee, do you?"

"Sakes alive! You can't tell; I never did like the way that silly young thing wears her hair!"

Then each went her separate way to spread the news of the quarrel. In the meantime Helen's dearest friend, Mary Rice, came in, and, seeing at once that something was wrong, said:

"Why, dearie, what is the matter? You look as though you had been crying your eyes out!"

Helen, knowing that confidences were never betrayed in this quarter, told her friend all about it, between fresh sobs. "A mother-in-law!" exclaimed Mary. "Heavens! What is your husband thinking about, to bring his mother here? Why, your home is as good as broken up already! There will be no more privacy in your lives. Home is never home with a mother-in-law in it! No, I never had one, but I know all about it. My married sisters, Jennie and Clara, each had a mother-in-law living with them, and they were never happy with their husbands until after Jennie's mother-in-law died and Clara's went to the Old Ladies' Home, because she felt so unwelcome, she said. And even now they are not really happy, you might say! They got so used to wrangling that it don't seem natural to even eat a meal without discord of some kind."

At this Helen sobbed again. "I just can't do it!"

"No, of course you can't, dear. Just get your husband to board her somewhere if she has no home. My husband would never think of imposing on me in that way! No, indeed! I wouldn't stand for it, you know—not after what I have seen with Jennie and Clara. Well, I must be going home. He will be home to supper and no supper ready. Good-by, dear. You just be firm now, and don't let your husband get the upper hand too soon." And Mary went out, leaving fresh rebellion in Helen's heart.

When James came home to supper, the house had that homely look that only the magnetic touch of a loving wife can create. Supper was ready. Helen was simply, but attractively, gowned in some filmy white affair that men like so well; but there were still traces of tears that it was impossible for her to hide.

James ran up the steps, and as she met him, exclaimed:

"Well, here I am, little woman, and as hungry as a bear!"

As he kissed her, he noticed the tell-tale face, but wisely said nothing. They ate their supper, talking cheerily, but there was a little restraint on the part of each that each hoped the other would not notice. They both knew that unpleasant discussions at the table were disastrous to domestic peace.

After supper, James sought his accustomed place by the open fire, where Helen soon joined him. She dropped a cushion on the floor by his side and nestled down with her head upon his knee.

After discussing his business and the general news in town, they had come into a harmony of thought where it was possible for him to broach the subject that was uppermost in both their minds.

"Well, wife, have we decided to make mother welcome to our home, and try and make up to her the loss of father and little Prue?" Helen averted her face and replied:

"This is your house, Jim, and of course you have a perfect right to take into it whom you please."

"Helen, sweetheart, your mother was the idol of your heart. You and she were perfect chums. When she was taken away you felt that life contained nothing for you any longer—until you came to me. Pet, I have a mother. She is as dear to me as yours was to you. We, too, were chums, when I lived at home. I did not grudge me that home after I came a man; all she had was mine. It was she who gave me birth—had it not been for her, you would not have me. It was she who nursed me through all childish sicknesses and griefs; it was she who watched over me those days and nights when the doctor had given me up. She would not give me up, but literally brought me back to life—and to you. Now she is alone in the world: Father and Mother are dead and I am all she has left. It is not dependent: if she were I am only able to provide for her elsewhere; it would be that of gratitude? Would we be happy together, knowing that mother is one and needs us?"

"Sweetheart, I would not refuse your mother a home with her daughter, had I the opportunity to provide it, and I know you will not refuse your home to my mother, who is now our mother, but I wish you would want her. Let us settle to-night, then make ready for her coming. When you feel like it I wish you would write to her and ask her to come and make her home with us—her children."

"This time Helen's face had relaxed, the intense suffering had left it, and she said:

"She shall come. I cannot promise to love her at first, but I will try."

James understood the struggle and appreciated the victory. The next day Helen wrote the letter and in due time received a charming note of acceptance. In a few weeks she was coming to them.

Helen began making ready. She did not think things that she loved to do as high for the last time, feeling that it would be so different when her mother-in-law came, and she would never be free again. She did not give expression to any such feeling, though James suspected it. However, this gave him no uneasiness, because he knew his mother so well that he felt certain that, with her wonderful tact, love and magnetic personality, all things would adjust themselves.

When Sarah Gadabout heard that the elder Mrs Sothern was coming to live with her son, she wagged her head and said:

"There, I told you so! I just knew those Sotherns had had a quarrel of some kind. It was over the mother-in-law."

She started right over to the parsonage where the Ladies' Aid met that afternoon. She was an hour late, but they all welcomed her, as they were sure she had some news or she would not be there at all.

Mary Rice cited many unpleasant experiences of her family and kept poor Helen in a continual inward struggle.

The day came. By this time Helen was simply anxious for the first ordeal to be over. If she could only get that mother-in-law in the house gracefully, and the first meal over without breaking down! She was hoping against hope that Mother Sothern would prove as dear as James had pictured her so many times, there in the gloaming, by the open fire.

The carriage drove up to the gate and Helen looked out of the parlor window to catch a first glimpse of her mother-in-law.

From the carriage stepped a little lady of some sixty years. She was dressed in gray from head to foot; her features were exactly like Jim's—and Helen loved Jim so! But the expression of her face! Even from the window, Helen could see that it was the sweetest, most spiritually lovely face that she had ever beheld! All her fears vanished in an instant; she rushed to the door, opened wide her arms in welcome, and cried:

"Mother!"

The response came quickly:

"Daughter!"

When James came home that night, he found them sitting—as he and Helen had sat the night they settled the question—with their hands clasped, talking of him, the most natural bond between them, and he knew that his mother's loving personality had conquered.

THE USE OF INFLUENCE*

LOOKING back over life every one is conscious of the effect upon him of the influence of persons with whom he comes in contact. He is what he is, to a considerable extent, because of the influence exerted upon him at certain crises of his career. The influence of the parent or teacher has tinted the thoughts and feelings of maturity, and it affects the prejudices even of old age. The octogenarian takes views of society and politics that he might not have taken if he had not had that particular kind of parent or teacher in his childhood. The outward conduct, too, is influenced. A man is conscious that his present habits and mode of life are different from what he might have been if he had not met a certain person, at a given time, who gave his life a new direction. It may have been for good or evil, but it had its effect. What he would have been if he had not married, or if he had married a different kind of woman, he can imagine. He came under her influence and inevitably, almost unconsciously, his life was changed. Or he may have been pursuing a quiet life in some country village and he formed the acquaintance of some city man and under whose influence he enters the circle of people that are like a new world to him. Or, he was drifting steadily downward, wasting life in dissipation, when by God's love he came under the influence of some pious man or woman and gained purer and higher thoughts and motives. It is not necessarily that he has been weak, with a character like clay, moulded into any shape by skillful hands, but he has been pressed here and there, undesignedly, by some one whom he admired and followed.

The consciousness of these changes that have occurred in his own life under the influence of others should prompt him to the utmost care about his own influence on others. His children, his young associates, his business comrades will feel his influence as he has felt the influence exerted upon him. Some careless word, some hasty action may have an effect unknown to him, but of far-reaching consequences; but it is the habitual tone of his life that will weigh most. A wise philosopher said that "the chain of consequences in another man's life that may be started by what we say or do or by the principles we have, is so long that there is no mountain high enough to give us a prospect of the end." If we could see the end, it might make us shudder at the responsibility. Will there be some who, half a century hence, will curse the day that they made our acquaintance? The thought is appalling, but the converse is equally true. Tom Hughes has shown with vivid force how the influence of Arnold affected the boys in his school, giving them higher standards of character and conduct. Our influence may be small in degree, but let us see to it that whatever the degree may be it is exerted in the right direction.

enemy much larger than his own during all the day, in order to retain the advantageous position for the whole army when it should come up, Congress associated Howard's name with that of Meade in a vote of thanks. It was near the close of the fighting of that day, when the troops were being located by Howard and his staff behind the stone fences on Cemetery Ridge, that one regiment came up the pike from the town in a rather demoralized condition, and its colonel hesitated or failed to turn them back to the new line. Howard seized the flag from the color-bearer in his one left hand, and started back in face of the bullets and planted the flag on the stone fence; the men, raising a cheer, followed, and were soon aligned with the other troops.

Meade came upon the field after midnight; and, just at daylight, at his request, Howard rode with him along the ridge and pointed out the natural strength of the position, and the exact location of the lines as he had established them. Meade asked on parting: "Well, Howard, what do you think of the position? Is it the place to fight the battle?" Howard replied, "I think it is a strong military position, General Meade." And the event proved the soundness of his judgment.

Under Grant and Sherman

When the Eleventh and Twelfth Corps went West, under Hooker, to reinforce Rosecrans after Chickamauga, Howard first met Grant. The battle of Wauhatchie, in Lookout Valley, was fought the very night when, just before sunset, the veterans from the Army of the Potomac had met the heroes of Thomas' army who had been starving in Chattanooga. They hailed them as friends in need for having re-established the "cracker-line" for the Army of the Cumberland. Grant, in his Memoirs, gives distinct credit for Howard's part in that night battle. Soon after, the Eleventh Corps took part in the great battle of Missionary Ridge, connecting the right of Sherman with the left of Thomas. Howard, in this way, was brought under the personal observation of both Grant and Sherman. Soon after, his corps marched under Sherman to the relief of Knoxville. Howard returned and had his camp in Lookout Valley. Here Col. Benjamin Harrison (afterwards President) with his brigade, joined the Eleventh Corps and, on Sundays, came to the little Sunday School for the poor whites and soldiers that Howard had arranged for in an unoccupied hospital tent.

The following spring, Howard was promoted to the Fourth Corps, on recommendation of Grant, a corps nearly double the Eleventh. During the hard marching and constant fighting of the Atlanta campaign Howard was under Thomas and also saw much of Sherman. Just before the fall of Atlanta, when McPherson was killed, Howard was surprised to receive the appointment to command the Army of the Tennessee. Within a day or two the battle of Ezra Church was fought by these troops, the veterans who captured Vicksburg. Although a stranger to them, when Howard passed along the lines at the close of this battle, the soldiers cheered him heartily and Sherman felt that he had made no mistake in recommending a corps commander of the Army of the Cumberland to command the army that he had brought from Vicksburg.

When he organized his forces for the march to the sea, Howard was given the right wing and continued in this position till the end of the war. Grant ordered him, after the assassination of Lincoln, to report to Secretary Stanton. The narrative of the meeting with the great War Secretary and of his statement that President Lincoln had designated him to be the head of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen and Abandoned Lands, is one of the many dramatic sketches of the two volumes.

General Howard's last station was on Governor's Island as commander of the Department of the Atlantic. He was here in 1894, the date of his retirement by reason of the age limit. His active Christian work in New York City at this period, and his fellowship with the church people of New York and Brooklyn, helped to soften the natural sense of loss, not to say regrets, at parting from the army associations of forty years.

The last chapter contains a vivid account of the wreck of the Spree. Dwight L. Moody, with his son and General Howard, held a prayer-meeting in Moody's stateroom when it seemed certain the ship would sink with all on board. Following is a brief extract from this thrilling account:

When I arrived (in New York), I found the newspapers filled with opposition to Moody's theory, which he expressed in the brief phrase: "Prayer saved the ship." When correspondents met me and asked for the facts, I said: "Mr. Moody's prayer had been, 'Please send us a ship, and smooth the waves so that we shall not be drowned.' The ship Huron did come in time to our rescue and we had a smooth sea for eight days back to Queenstown, Ireland. What we asked for came, but whether our heavenly Father performed a miracle to bring this about I do not know. You ask for daily bread and receive it, and that is sufficient.

It was remarkable that only one man perished on the Spree. He jumped overboard and refused the help offered him; a German sailor said: "He murdered himself." That homeward trip had hundreds of incidents peculiar to such a situation, but whatever our belief, surely we were made to feel, as Moody said, that "God is Love."

Sleeping in Church

SOME one writes to ask: "Why do people sleep in church? Is it because the sermon is dull, or the music not pleasing? Often, at any rate, is it not because the atmosphere in the church is so close that the mind has not the power to absorb good thoughts and so goes to sleep? If the ministers want large and appreciative audiences, let them ventilate their churches. This interrogation was put at a recent meeting of the Social Economics Club in Chicago, by Dr. Annette Ayers, who took up the subject of the correct way to wake up sleepy congregations." This subject of headachy churches is becoming a common one in these days. It is certainly true that there is often a condition of somnolence or involuntary sleepiness among congregations. Formerly it used to be asserted that the dulness of the pastor's sermons or the poorness of his delivery was the cause of the trouble; but people are now beginning to realize that such a verdict is unjust. Scientific authorities now point to a totally different cause and declare that bad air is the real cause of congregational sleepiness in a great majority of cases.

They tell us that the low ceiling of the average modern church makes it possible for little pockets of noxious gases to be accumulated in the corners and even in the "sunbursts" which decorate the centre of the ceilings. More careful attention to the condition of the wall surfaces would remedy the trouble. Every wall surface should be porous, else the room will be air-tight. Where hundreds of all classes of people are gathered together, there may be various stages of health as well as varying degrees of disease. The constant breathing of the same air fills the building with germs, which rest there until the circulation of air from the furnace or the door starts them into circulation again ready to lodge on some unlucky mortal. If the walls of the church were coated with Alabastine or some similar antiseptic substance, of sufficient tenacity and durability, so that it could be brushed down at regular intervals, there would be no danger. A clean church is a live and wakeful church and a healthy one. President Colclitt, of the Royal British Architects, says: "I must protest very strongly against the use of glazed surfaces on church walls. My own experience with them has been that of discomfort and irritation." In view of the knowledge which science affords on this subject, it is certainly poor economy for any church, afflicted with sleepiness, if nothing worse, among its members, to neglect the condition of the walls. Clean up your walls, and put fresh vigor in your congregation, and you will have fewer complaints of dull preaching and drowsy audiences.

SELF SHARPENING CUTS TO THE END THIS DOES IT

Bishop Henry Y. Satterlee Dead

CHRISTIANS of all denominations sympathize with the Protestant Episcopal Church in the loss it has sustained by the death of Dr. Henry Yates Satterlee, Bishop of Washington, D.C. The good bishop had won the respect of all the churches by his sound common sense, his geniality, and his strong and hearty sympathy with the poor. His was a stalwart Christianity, having the principles of Christ's teaching applied to modern life with a force and directness that were sometimes startling to his hearers and readers. He had a faculty of going below the surface of the letter, and showing the principle which Christ enunciated and how it applied to society as at present constituted. He studied the problems of the poor with the view of devising means for their solution. Every man with whom he came in contact knew that in the bishop he had a sincere friend and wise counselor, and it is no wonder that he was loved. While he was a rector in New York, he was a hard worker and devoted himself, heart and soul, to the welfare of his people. The Galilee Mission and the Olive Tree Inn, already described in these pages, were the fruit of his earnest endeavors to lift the burdens that lie heavy on the shoulders of the wage-earners of the city. In the pulpit he strove manfully to bring the selfish among the rich to a sense of their responsibility, and when he became a bishop and went to Washington, he did not modify his teaching to please men of power and influence. Bishop Satterlee, on one occasion, occupied a position representative of the church in other lands. In 1896 when the Armenian massacres had aroused the indignation and horror of all Christendom, a petition was prepared for presentation to the Czar of Russia, asking him to interfere in conjunction with other European Powers for the protection of the Armenian Christians. It was signed not only by bishops and prominent men in this country, but by the Archbishop of Canterbury and other prelates of the English Church. Bishop Satterlee happened to be in Europe and was urged to present it. It was believed that the petition would have more weight with the Czar if it reached his hands through an American. Bishop Satterlee consented, and though many persons doubted whether he would obtain an audience on so delicate a matter, he was received most cordially by the Czar, who discussed with him the difficulties of Russian interference. He was also honored by the Dowager Empress of Russia, who invited the Bishop to dine with her. Though the mission failed, as was inevitable, the failure was made as palatable as possible for the American envoy by these imperial courtesies.

The bishop was sixty-five years of age when he died. He had been staying at Providence, R. I., and on his way back to Washington he caught a severe cold. He insisted on officiating as usual at the Sunday services. On the following day, however, it was seen that his attack was serious. Pneumonia set in and he died. He had been twelve years bishop in Washington. Previously he had spent thirteen years in New York as rector of Calvary Church. He was descended from an old English family, the first representative of which came to this country in 1685.

The Love of God

COULD oceans, rivers, springs and lakes,
All that the name of water takes Beneath the extended skies,
Be turned to ink of blackest hue,
And every drop of falling dew
To make the wonder rise;
A book so large could we suppose,
Which thinnest paper could compose,
As the whole earthly ball;
Were every shrub and every tree,
And every blade of grass we see
Open to write withal;
Were all that ever lived on earth,
Since nature first received her birth,
Most skilful scribes to place
In clearest light that wondrous love,
Found in the heart of God above
Toward Adam's ruined race;
Were each Methuselah in age,
And every moment write a page,
They'd all be tired and die.
The pens would every one wear out,
The book be filled within—without,
The ink be drained all dry;
And then to show that love, oh, then,
Angels above as well as men,
Archangels e'en would fail;
Nay—till eternity should end,
A whole eternity they'd spend,
And not have told the tale.

A CHURCH OF MANY ACTIVITIES

A CHURCH anniversary of a notable kind was celebrated recently in New York City. It was the twentieth anniversary of the West End Presbyterian Church, which has grown from a little band of sixty-nine members meeting in an old election booth to a church with 1,845 names on its membership roll, a Sunday School of 1,178 and a church plant worth nearly $300,000. There was a distinct leading of Providence in the organization of the church. It was founded in 1888 in a sparsely settled neighborhood. All around were vacant lots and a few frame houses. Now Amsterdam Avenue and One Hundred and Fifth Street, where the church stands, is the centre of a large population. It seemed as if God had foreseen the coming settlers and had moved his people to provide a church home for them.

The church has been blessed in its pastors as well as its location. Dr. A. E. Keigwin, its present pastor, has had only one predecessor, Rev. John Balcom Shaw, D.D., now of Chicago, whose ministry of six years in the West End Church was signally blessed of God. He nursed the church through its infancy, as Dr. Keigwin has trained it through adolescence to its year of majority, on which it now enters.

The West End is a typical institutional church. The edifice is used every night of the week, and there is a church house at 166 West One Hundred and Fifth Street, which is open all day and evening. The lower floor is for men and boys and the upper for women and girls. Besides the musical organizations, the church operates an employment bureau, has relief committees, and conducts mothers' meetings. There are also gymnasium classes for men and girls under qualified instructors. Other organizations are the Good Cheer Circle of the King's Daughters, Nimble Fingers, Girls' Club, Forward Movement Class, Young Women's Bible Class, Mission Study Class, athletic clubs, basketball team, not to mention the Christian Endeavor Societies and the graded Sunday School. Rev. J. Garland Hamner, Jr., the assistant pastor, is superintendent of the Sunday School, and is in regular attendance at the church house, and assists Dr. Keigwin in the parish visiting. The church has under its spiritual care all the children in the Half-Orphan Asylum at Manhattan Avenue and One Hundred and Fifth Street. Last season the church maintained a summer Bible school for children, which had a daily attendance of eighty-nine, and it expects to do likewise next summer. The three teachers are college students.

Rev. A. E. Keigwin, D.D.

The West End Church is another illustration of the rule that obtains of all prosperous churches in being a missionary church. The long list of its activities seems to have stimulated instead of retarding missionary zeal. Four missionaries in heathen lands and three domestic missionaries derive their support from this church and its societies. Rev. John E. Williams and Mrs. Williams, at Nanking, China; Rev. D. A. Yammin, at Baalbec, Syria; and Mr. E. A. Ford, at Libreville, Africa, are laboring in the foreign field; and Dr. C. H. Ellis and Mrs. Ellis, at Phoenix, Ariz., and Rev. Oscar E. Tell, at Parker, S. D., are working in our own outlying spheres. A still more notable contribution to the cause of missions, the church has made in giving four of its own members to the work, three of whom are serving in India and one in China.

Attendance at public worship

ATTENDANCE AT PUBLIC WORSHIP

WHY we should go to church, the question propounded by the managers of the League last week, is answered in this topic. There are other reasons besides those of worship and service, but these are the chief reasons. Attendance at the church service is a public acknowledgment that we desire to join in the worship of God and an expression of our readiness to take part in his service. It is true that the real personal worship is done in the closet when we enter into personal relations with God, and between the two, if one must be omitted, it is the public service that we can best spare. But the one will naturally impel to the other, and he who prays most earnestly and sincerely in solitude, will be the one who will most enjoy and gain most profit from the public service. His heart is with them who fill the Lord's courts and sing his praises, though, if deprived of that privilege, he is not shut out from spiritual communion with God. In his heart are the ways to God's throne. We can imagine a man in a desert or in a heathen land, offering in solitude acceptable worship, but if he is in any place where men unite in worship, we cannot imagine his voluntarily absenting himself from the assembly. His fellow-worshippers may be of a different creed from his own, and may have a different mode of worshipping God, but they worship the same being and he will wish to add his mite to the tribute of praise. It is in the sanctuary, too, that God imparts the impulse and the strength for service. The Christian is reminded there of the need of service, of the opportunity and of his own call to work. He is reminded of the obligations laid upon him and of Christ's injunction, "Freely ye have received, freely give." He finds his problems solved there. David said he was puzzled about many things, but when he went into the assembly, he understood. To the worshipers God makes revelations either by the reading of his Word, or by the message of the preacher. The worshiper goes there, too, as a soldier of the Lord's army to receive his orders, and to receive the inspiration that comes from comradeship. Men have come away from an assembly with a new impulse to labor, a new consecration which they would never have received in solitary worship or meditation. The servant of the Lord who conducts the service is gladdened by the sight of those who have come together. He realizes that he is not as a voice in the wilderness, but is among those who have sympathy with him in his aims and efforts, and he is stimulated to further energy. Thus the attendant renders indirect service and contributes to the general benefit. He does good as well as gets good, and thus in both ways the service is profitable to him. So the advice of the Scripture is justified, Forsake not the assembling of yourselves together.

LIGHT BREAKS IN Thoughtful Farmer Learns About Coffee

Many people exist in a more or less hazy condition and it often takes years before they realize that coffee is the cause of the cloudiness, and that there is a simple way to let the light break in.

A worthy farmer had such an experience and tells about it in a letter. He says:

"For about forty years, I have had indigestion and stomach trouble in various forms. During the last twenty-five years I would not more than get over one spell of bilious colic until another would be on me.

"The best doctors I could get and all the medicines I could buy only gave me temporary relief.

"Change of climate was tried without results. I could not sleep nights, had rheumatism and my heart would palpitate at times so that it seemed it would jump out of my body.

"I came to the conclusion that there was no relief for me and that I was about wound up, when I saw a Postum advertisement. I had always been a coffee drinker, and got an idea from the ad. that maybe coffee was the cause of my trouble.

"I began to drink Postum instead of coffee and in less than three weeks I felt like a new man. The rheumatism left me, and I have never had a spell of bilious colic since.

"My appetite is good, my digestion never was better and I can do more work than before for forty years.

"I haven't tasted coffee since I began with Postum. My wife makes it according to directions and I relish it as well as I ever did coffee, and I was certainly a slave to coffee."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pgs. "There's a Reason."

INFINITE CONDESCENSION

By MRS. M. BAXTER

HOW few consider who it is that, being so high, came down so low! How few grasp, for a moment, something of what it cost him to enter into the limits and into the deep humiliation of a human life, and live alongside of fallen creatures, debased by sin, in whom the image of God, in which man was created, is so far obliterated! What must it have been for him to dwell with such, who, from uprightness in which God made man, have fallen into crookedness and untruth, becoming more one with God's great enemy, the father of lies, than with him who is the Truth! He, the holy and spotless One, came not only as a Benefactor, to visit us from above, for a moment or an hour. He came "and dwelt among us," a Man among men, a dependent One among dependent ones, a Learner amongst learners, One who "learned obedience," "suffered being tempted," and was "tempted in all points like as we are," and even died—died for us! This is grace.

"And we beheld his glory." On the Mount of Transfiguration the veil was lifted for a moment. The Light of the world shone out before human eyes, and after his resurrection and ascension his disciples understood that he had been shining all along, but that only when the Holy Ghost took possession of them on the day of Pentecost were they able to perceive the glory of the spiritual "which the Holy Ghost teacheth" (I. Cor. 2: 13), and they saw in the whole life of Jesus, as they looked back upon it with eyes illuminated from above, "His glory, glory as of the Only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth." Yes, it was a wondrous Life which existed in Jesus of Nazareth, the Only-begotten of the Father! His very breath, his every word and deed, was grace; undeserved mercy to man; and it was truth, rectitude, transparency, holiness; grace which had in it no compromise, and rectitude which was in unspeakable love, and yet unbending righteousness. Grace and truth. This is the character of our God.

Oh, how poor are human words! All the life of Jesus was the language of God's grace, and God's truth to man, for he was "the Word," the Message of God to man. He brought God near to man, not in a weak belittling of sin, but in taking upon himself every detail of every sin of every man, and in his own person making atonement for each one, he met the mighty debt of obligation to the righteousness of a holy God, and rectified the disturbed balance which might have existed in the divine relation of Father and of Judge. The work was done by the Word made flesh. But this was not enough for him: He would choose out and educate from among men those who would understand and follow him whithersoever he went, after they had suffered with him, to reign also with him, united to him and to the Father by the Holy Spirit for ever. This is grace and truth.

The faithful preaching of repentance by John the Baptist, his glad introduction of Jesus as "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world," and then his glad sinking into the shade, while his disciples left him for his Lord, and then his martyr-death, all showed how very really he had drunk into the spirit of his Master. This man was filled with the Holy Ghost. Never was there found a man more averse to speak about himself. "I am not," was his answer to those who questioned him, until at last he took up the prophecy of him in Isaiah 43, and owned, "I am a voice," only a voice, to tell about my coming Master. Don't notice me; behold him. How unlike so many who go about telling people that they are filled with the Holy Ghost! The Holy Ghost was so self-evident in John the Baptist's reticence about himself that it could not be mistaken. He was indeed a forerunner of him by whom came grace and truth.

The same dependence on the Holy Spirit was seen when our beloved Lord called his first disciples, "not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble" (I. Cor. 1: 26).

Questions and Answers

F. M., Petersburg, O. 1. Was not Judas hasty in committing suicide? Might he not have been forgiven? 2. Was there any special virtue in the blessing a father conferred on his son? Why was Esau so cast down in missing it? 3. What significance had the ladder of which Jacob dreamed?

1. Every man who commits suicide is hasty. He is impatient and rash, rushing out of troubles that might be lifted if he waited. Heinous as Judas' sin was, Christ would probably have pardoned him as he did Peter, if he had been penitent. 2. That was the popular idea of the time. The blessing could not have been more than a prayer. The patriarchs had no more power than other men to confer blessings. 3. Jacob probably regarded it as a symbol of the connection between heaven and earth.

Mrs. E. B., Bellingham, Wash. Why were the names of many of the old Gospel songs designated as "Duke Street," "Martyn," "Green-ville," etc.?

Probably "Duke Street" was in the town where John Hatton, the composer, lived; the same as to Greenville; but Martyn was probably named for some friend of the composer. In those old days singing-books were the fashion for use in choirs, conventions, and singing-schools, and with men like Lowell Mason, Wm. B. Bradbury, I. B. Woodbury, and L. O. Emerson, who wrote hundreds of tunes and anthems each, it was a big proposition to name them all, so Bible names, street names, and names of friends were used.

J. W., Bald Eagle, Pa. 1. Name the director of the first United States government mint organized in 1792? 2. Were there any gold or silver pieces coined with the sanction of the colonial governments previous to that time?

1. The first director of the mint was David Rittenhouse, appointed by President Washington, April 14, 1792, resigned 1795 on account of ill-health. He was succeeded by H. W. De Saussure. 2. The earliest coinage in America was that of the Virginia Company in 1612-15. It consisted of silver sixpences and shillings, each coin having a hog on it. In 1652, the Boston mint (John Hull, mint-keeper) issued the "pine tree" coins, silver three-penny, six-penny and shilling pieces. These were in colonial days. After independence, while arranging for the establishment of the new United States mint and during the preliminary work, the first coin of the new republic was struck by Benjamin Dudley, as Morris records in his diary.

W. P., White Plains, Ky. Does the Tower of Babel, which was built in the land of Shinar, still stand?

The tower of Babel has long since disappeared. What were once supposed to be the ruins of it were found in Babylonia under a great mound known to the Arabs and natives as Birs Nimroud, but the identification has now been discarded.

S. S., Greenville, S. C. From which one of Noah's sons did the Mongolians spring?

Their descent is not positively traced by ethnologists. Some assert, however, that the Mongolians, from earliest history, were a nomad race, of mixed stock, and distinct from the Aryans proper and also distinct from the Shemites and Hamites. The presumption would seem to favor their Japhetic origin, but even this cannot be positively affirmed. Shem had five sons, the descendants of only two of whom are recorded, so it is possible that the Mongols may have a claim to Shemite extraction at least.

W. M. C., Wilmington, N. C. Why was the tribe of Dan omitted in the scaling of the tribes in Rev. 7 and both Joseph and Manasseh included?

It appears to have decreased in numbers even before the exile. The lists given in Chronicles indicate that the tribe was small and unimportant. Probably in John's time it had dropped out of sight altogether. Joseph's name stands in the place of Ephraim's. Joseph was promised two portions (Gen. 48: 22). So in all the lists of tribes Ephraim and Manasseh count as tribes, though they were grandchildren of Jacob.

Subscriber, Oskaloosa, Ia. What should a boy of fifteen weigh, and what should his height be?

He should weigh ninety-six pounds and stand a little over five feet high. It would require a long discussion to answer your other questions.

J. W. V., Blawenburg, N. Y. I saw in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that you give the birthday of George Washington as February 22, 1732. I have since learned that the date was February 11, 1732, and the change in time makes it come eleven days later. As there has been such a change in the last 176 years, what will be the change in the next 176 years?

There will be no change in the future in the date celebrated. The difference in dates you refer to comes from the change in reckoning from "old style" to "new style." The new style, as the Gregorian error of Maryland, and arrived with colonists March 20, 1634. 3. Le Moine d'Iberville belonged to a noble French-Canadian family. He was born in 1642 and died in 1706. He was a naval commander and explorer. He was the founder of Louisiana. He was one of the leaders of the force that captured and burned Schenectady, N. Y., in 1690, and he also took Pemaquid, Me. He died in Havana, Cuba, while preparing to attack the coast of North Carolina. The other character you wrote for we could not find.

Reader, Worcester, Mass. Would you advise a young man to go "on the road" as a traveling salesman?

If he has the qualifications there can be no objection. For such a position he requires to be a good, persuasive talker, and to know his "line" of business thoroughly. There are many peculiar temptations to which traveling salesmen are liable, however, and one must needs be well grounded gress, The Holy War and Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD can supply you with Pilgrim's Progress. The others can be procured through any regular bookseller.

T. W. C., Selma, O. What became of St. Paul and St. Peter? I find no account of their deaths in the Bible.

According to the accepted records, Paul was beheaded at Rome by Nero, and Peter was crucified at Rome with his head downward.

Mrs. E. G. Hawley, Kenwood, N. Y. (a reader who was born in Ceylon in 1814), sends this interesting bit of ornithology, apropos of the recent paragraph in THE MAIL-BAG about Elijah and the ravens:

Mr. Delater said the ravens of Ceylon were very large birds and very troublesome. They would enter an open door or window and carry off a leg of veal or any other meat sufficient for a good sized family's dinner. Now, if the ravens in Ceylon do that, it would be an easy matter for ravens to deposit their plunder where Elijah could help himself. God made the ravens; he gave them an instinct. Undoubtedly the Bible record is literally correct.

O. E. S., Williams, N. C. Is there any such church as "Omish" in this country, or is there any history of such church as the "Omish" Church?

The Omish Church is a sect of the Mennonites in this country, who have derived their peculiar name from one of their preachers of the seventeenth century. The Omish are also found in Germany and Switzerland.

Reader, Great Barrington, Mass. There are two systems of wireless telegraphy, the Marconi and DeForest. The Marconi Wireless Telegraph Company of America, 27 William Street, New York, can give you the information. You should have sent your full address.

Reader, Fayette, O. 1. It is not in the Bible. 2. Tattooing probably had its origin in the custom, still in vogue in some heathen countries, of making tribal marks on the skin. The Maoris of New Zealand used to tattoo the whole face. In some parts of Africa it is still practised.

B., Boston. Speaking broadly, we would say emphatically that a Christian could not consistently patronize a Sabbath-desecrating business. Works of necessity or of mercy, however, are excusable on the Lord's Day. If the work to which you refer belongs to either of these classes, it is admissible; otherwise not.

A Strange Ceremony for Bible Scholars in an English Village

What is known in England as "The Glanville Charity" was founded by William Glanville, a barrister of the Inner Temple, London, at the town of Wotton, Surrey. A curious provision in his will was that a number of boys should visit the testator's tomb on the anniversary of his death, and "repeat by heart and without book, in a plain and audible voice, the Lord's Prayer, the Apostles' Creed, and the Ten Commandments, in the English tongue," and should "also read the fifteenth chapter of the First Epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians." To each of five boys chosen out of the parish of Wotton by the trustees of the charity were to be paid forty shillings (equal to $10), together with a further sum of ten pounds ($50) on the apprenticeship of any one of the boys who had obtained the first gift of forty shillings. The artist has presented this unique examination at the last anniversary of Mr. Glanville's death.

A. E. W., Bingham, S. C. 1. Who was Sir William Pepperell, and what did he do? 2. Who was Leonard Calvert? 3. Who was d'Iberville, and in what way was he distinguished?

Sir William Pepperell was born in Kittery, Me., in 1696; died in 1759. He was the son of a Welshman who settled in Maine and became a wealthy shipbuilder. Young Pepperell was a justice of the peace at twenty-one, and soon rose to be colonel of all the troops of Maine, then a part of Massachusetts. When King George's War broke out he took command of the colonial army sent against the fortress of Louisbourg, on Cape Breton, and after a siege compelled the French to surrender. King George made Pepperell a baronet. He was governor of Massachusetts, a major-general in the French and Indian War, and a lieutenant-general. He was one of the greatest figures in our colonial history. 2. Leonard Calvert was an English statesman. He was born about 1606 and died in 1647. He was the first govin moral principles to resist these successfully.

RELIGIOUS LIFE AT WEST POINT

By WILLIAM J. ROE

Forty years ago there was nothing that could properly be called religious in the life of a cadet at the Military Academy. In place of piety there existed a rude, almost barbaric, but wonderfully sincere code of honor. It prescribed rigorously and enforced effectually these three great rules of honorable conduct: 1. Thou shalt not steal. 2. Thou shalt not lie. 3. Thou shalt not be afraid.

As an ethical trilogy, this was effective enough, at least for the maintenance of discipline. Beyond these requirements, infraction of the law of Sinai, or of any moral code whatever, were matters of taste, sentiment, or the usages of society. A few among the corps of cadets in those days—a very few (in 1867 not more than six or eight)—held higher views of their religious obligation. These met occasionally for private worship, to be rewarded with hardly repressed sneers.

But though the laws of cadet morality were few, they were administered with inflexible severity. From 1862 to 1866, four members of the corps were ignominiously expelled from West Point by the cadets themselves, without appeal to the authorities, and with no opportunity for self-defense. Of these four, only one refused to submit to expulsion. This one, it is only fair to state, after having been driven away, returned to the academy, demanded justice from the superintendent, was sustained, tried by court-martial and acquitted of wrong doing.

Religious life at the Military Academy in later years underwent a great change for the better. Since that time, forty years ago, the order of study and discipline, keeping always well to the front of the advancing culture and progress of the world, has never wavered. Practically the same rigorous routine is maintained to-day as that which prevailed nearly a century ago. Hours of study and recitation are as long, the standards of excellence as high, and the drilling as severe. The Spartan fare of the olden time at the mess-hall, however, has been replaced by a more generous diet, and some effort is now made to give the cadets opportunity for social culture; but with these exceptions, and the enlargement of the corps consequent upon the growing needs of a larger army, the routine of a cadet's life is almost what it has been so long as any living graduate can remember.

In dealing with the private life and individual religious convictions of the students at West Point, the hall in military fashion with side-arms, and due decorum being exacted as a military duty.

Services, at present, are conducted according to the order prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer of the Protestant Episcopal Church, although in the past they have often been according to the mode of worship of other Protestant denominations. No one is compelled to attend these services. The Roman Catholic finds here his own church and his priest, and the right of conscience even of the Hebrew is respected. No one need attend at the chapel, if he is willing to affirm "on his honor" that he has scruples of conscience.

Among the cadets themselves, however, a very active interest in religious matters has become firmly established. The chaplains of the past have always been devout, God-fearing men; some striving for higher standards of religious life in the corps, but few meeting with much encouragement, and others quite daunted by the prevalent atmosphere, not exactly of indifference, but certainly of pronounced apathy. From this lethargic condition the corps of cadets became aroused by no special single agency. There has never been at West Point, as at many other universities, a "revival of religion." Slowly, year after year, beginning during the seventies, the change has come.

Probably among all the influences tending to educate and encourage the vitality of religion among the cadets, none has been so effective as the modest work of two sisters, the Misses Susan and Anna Warner, whose home was on Constitution Island opposite West Point. These noble women, members of the famous literary Warner family, began about the year 1870 to conduct Sunday meetings for Bible reading and study, among a few of the families of officers on the post. It was not long before some among the more serious of the cadets joined these classes—if classes they may be called. Little by little the gatherings enlarged. Miss Susan Warner died many years ago, but the work was kept up by her younger sister, and has been continued to the present time. Many an

Federal Government and the military authorities have never deviated one hair's-breadth from that principle which absolutely forbids interference. To-day, as formerly, attendance once on Sunday at some form of religious service is expected. The chapel, now located on the plain, but soon to be replaced by a far finer structure on the hills, is no longer used for services, these being held in the great audience hall of the Cullem Memorial building, the corps of cadets marching to and from the

THE AMERICAN PULPIT

A SERMON BY
Rev. F. DeWitt Talmage, D.D.

Light for the Perplexed

TEXT: Acts 1: 24: "And they prayed, Thou, Lord, which knowest the hearts of all men, show whether of these two thou hast chosen."

THE Crucifixion was over. The little scattered band of disciples had been brought together by the second and third appearances of Jesus. The ascension also was over. Now the disciples were abiding at Jerusalem awaiting the Day of Pentecost. The time seemed to the disciples appropriate for completing the organization of the infant church. The defection of Judas had left only eleven apostles. Should not the mystical number corresponding to the twelve tribes of Israel be made up? The disciples appear to have thought so. One reason was that the number of authorized witnesses to the life, work and resurrection of Jesus should not be diminished. They would choose from among them one who, having been with them from the beginning, was competent to give such testimony. There were two such men, Joseph and Matthias. Either of these was eligible, and a choice must be made.

An Apostolic Election

What did the disciples do? Did they turn their meeting into a political caucus as so many of our religious meetings become when a new elder or a new pastor or a new bishop is to be chosen? Did one of the disciples say, "Select Barsabas, because he is my sister's husband"? Did another disciple say, "Oh, elect Matthias, because he has lent me money, and as he has helped me I want to do him a favor"? Do you suppose another said, "We will elect Luke or Mark because we want to have our friends on the Apostolate"? Do you suppose God would have sent a Day of Pentecost if such a selfish spirit had moved those disciples? No, no! That was not the way the place of Judas was filled. These disciples said, "We will make no mistake. We will throw the whole responsibility upon God." Thus they went to their knees. "O Lord," they cried, "make this selection for thy honor and glory." Were they right? Ought not we to make every important move of our life a matter of earnest, intense prayer? Should we not learn to trust God and follow his leadings? "And they prayed, Thou, Lord, which knowest the hearts of all men, show whether of these two thou hast chosen." They were wise and pious men. I commend their example to every one of you. There come times when you must stand at the parting of life's ways. You hesitate which way you will take, because your whole future seems to hang on your decision. Then do as the disciples did: turn to God who knows all things and ask him to direct you. Ask him which of the two ways he chooses for you.

In the first place I would turn the attention of young people to the message of my text. I would first speak to those who have not yet decided what is to be their occupation in life. I am not now addressing those who are coming to the close of their studies in medicine, or the law, or theology. They are like the sea captain who has already set his compass and has left harbor and is sailing for a chosen port. I talk to the young people who do not know what they ought to be in life, or what vocation they should follow. I am speaking to those just about to graduate from our grammar schools, who have not yet decided what line of work or of studies they will follow. That time of life is the most critical of all, because a mistake now in all probability will mean a mistake irreparable.

Choosing an Occupation

Some of you have no doubt what you are to do. Some time ago I addressed the graduating class of one of our grammar schools. The chief attraction of the exercises was the wonderful playing of a famous musician of our city. When he ran his fingers over the keys, he could make that piano talk or weep or laugh or dance or march or thunder or sigh. We encored him again and again. After the meeting was over his daughter told a member of my family that her father was born with such a genius for music that he could play upon any musical instrument. It was just as natural for him to play as it is for a bird to sing or for a fish to swim or for a rabbit to burrow. Thus some men are born artists, or born inventors, or born financiers, or born orators; and this genius of their minds is manifested when they are very young. But most of us were not developed that way. When we were in our teens we were entirely in the dark about what God wanted us to do.

"What would you do with your son, if he came to fifteen years of age and did not know what he wanted to be?" a lady of my church said to me some time ago. "My son is a bright boy; but he has no overpowering desire for any one line of work." There is a fine good boy who is just as much in the dark about the future as you and I were when we were in our teens. And yet a mistake now might ruin his whole future life. If you get wrong upon the first part of your journey of life, you are apt to follow the wrong path clear to the end. What had that young boy better do? What had that father and mother better do? They had all better get down on their knees and pray. They had better lift up an earnest petition to God that he will direct that young boy to choose the vocation which he should follow. For God had a purpose for him when he was born. And the whole happiness of that boy, as well as his usefulness, depends upon his making no mistake in following the line of work God intended him to do.

Lowell's Class Poem

But, fathers and mothers, before you start in this prayerful selection of the line of work your boy or girl will follow through life, I want you to thoroughly consecrate yourselves to the Master. For if you do not you may receive a jolt that you will never get over. What God wants that boy to do, and what you want him to do, may be as far apart as the North Star is distant from the Equator. God may want that boy to enter the ministry. God may want that girl to go to foreign lands as a missionary. God may want your son to be a reformer with his pen. What God wants, and you, the parent, wants, may bitterly clash unless you are ready to surrender your will to his will.

The story is told that when James Russell Lowell was class poet, a friend sent his father, Doctor Lowell, an account of the commencement at Harvard, at which the son had achieved such a brilliant success. The old gentleman at the time was staying in Rome. When he received the account, instead of being pleased, he was very angry, and said, "Well, well! look at this. I am very sorry and disappointed. James promised me when I left home that he would give up poetry and stick to his books. I hoped he had become less flighty." Yet it was as a poet that Lowell was destined to achieve fame. Thus what God wants your boy to do, and what you would like to have him do, may be entirely different. And yet, my brother, all the happiness and the usefulness of your son is to be decided within the next few months. Better pray, and pray earnestly, that God will help him to choose aright in the selection of his life vocation. Better not let your will run counter to God's will.

But after we have asked God to select our children's work in life, we must not stop here in our divine pleadings. The school or the college in which our children prepare for their life's work is important. Now you had better make a prayerful selection of the institutions to which you send your children during the critical formative periods of their lives. You need God's help here as you need him in other vital matters. You need to plead to him for guidance just as much as the disciples needed to pray for wisdom to make a right selection for the vacancy in the Apostolate.

The older I grow, the more I am amazed to see how blindly and in what a "don't care" spirit most parents allow their children to select the school or college at which they are to be educated. Very slight and trivial reasons weigh with the boy. Do you want to know how I went to a certain military school? There was a boy who lived on our block who went there. He came home for his vacations dressed in a beautiful uniform. That uniform, with its silver buttons and shining chevrons, was the envy of all the neighborhood. Like most of the boys on our street, I wanted to go to a school which would let boys dress up in a uniform like that. And though that school at that time was not what it ought to be in many respects, yet the infinitesimal thing of a little silver button took me to that school, where I passed four long years of the most important part of my educational life. Hundreds and thousands of young folks go to a school because a friend goes there, or because that college has a fine football team, or because that institution is the largest university in the State, or because that college is situated in the East. And the great essentials of the moral and spiritual characteristics of that educational institution are passed over as though they did not amount to anything.

Did you ever realize that a university or a college has an atmosphere or a soul? Are you not aware that just as you have certain special characteristics that in your life stand for something, so an educational institution has its distinct personality and stands for something, and that something is for the benefit or injury of the students who live within its walls? I received some time ago a letter from an old and very dear classmate. He was writing about some of the weaknesses of the college we both love. Then he wrote the sentence, which I have often pondered over, because presented a truth in a way that I had never had driven into my mind before: "Educational institutions are controlled by individuals who are merely human and human actions are vital there as elsewhere." Do you grasp that tremendous fact? Who are the men at the head of those institutions to which you intend to send your boys? What is the moral and spiritual status of the members of those faculties? Are they noted for their Christian principles? Are they professors who will instill reverent ideas of God and of the higher life? These are questions which you should ponder well before you let that boy leave your fire-side for scholastic halls. Better pray over that fact earnestly and long. God alone can direct you so that you will make no mistake.

Business Partnerships

But we cannot always remain at school. We cannot always be preparing for the battle of life. After a while we must do something besides talking about what we intend to do. So from scholastic walls we step forth into the struggle of life. Then we must enter into certain business partnerships and professional affiliations. Whom shall we trust? With whom shall we go? Whom shall we allow to enter the holy of holies of our hearts? These are weighty questions which I am putting to you to-day. For a man's success is not more due to what he himself does than to what his business associates do. To a great extent they make him or break him.

What a lot of trouble you would have saved if you had only known what a rascal your partner was, before you hitched up with him in business! Do you suppose your mother and father would have let you enter into that business partnership if they had known what kind of a man he was? "Oh, no," you reply. "My parents love me too much to let me get into such quicksands of trouble as that." Yes, you are right! But tell me, friend, does not God love you as much as your father or your mother? Would he not have guarded you from that trouble if you had only asked him? Did you ask God's advice when you entered into that business arrangement? Am I making too literal interpretation of the Gospel? What do you mean by that sign which is tacked over your office door, "Business during business hours"? Does that mean that God has no part in your business? No! Then, if that is not so, why do you not ask God to help you select your partners and guide you in your great financial deals? Is that sentence of the Lord's Prayer a mockery?—"Give us this day our daily bread." Ah, my brother, as a business man you had better get down on your knees and pray for wisdom. God will guide you. Yes, he will. He will answer your prayers in the store just the same as he helped the disciples to choose Matthias for the vacancy in the Apostolate. God hears his children pray by the store counter on Monday and Tuesday and Wednesday, just as much as he hears his ministers pray on Sunday in the church pulpit.

At the Marriage Altar

But though our partnership papers at the store are important, there are closer and more important human relationships than even this. And this other partnership has as much to do with what we financially make, as it has to do with the home and with the happiness of domestic life. I am alluding to the partnership of the marriage altar. Some people look upon marriage as a joke; but it is far from being a joke. The marriage altar should be the most solemn place this side of heaven; for if it is not the joyful enslavement of love, it is the most awful tragedy of life and it is, in too many cases, the merciless rock upon which the craft of earthly happiness is shipwrecked.

But, though marriage is one of the vital pivots upon which usefulness as well as happiness turns, yet how blindly and ignorantly most people enter sacred wedlock! Too often it seems to be the blind leading the blind. And I am not alluding simply to the young when they get married, but to the middle-aged and to the old who get married as well. Indeed I sometimes think it is far easier for a young man to pick out a good wife, than it is for a middle-aged man to make a happy selection. The older people grow the more expert they become in the ability to deceive if they are naturally mean and contemptible in disposition. And some of the meanest people on earth can make the

Pastor Sheldon's Negro Kindergarten

THE kindergarten school for negroes in the district known as "Tennessee Town," in Topeka, Kan., is now in its fifteenth year. Last Christmas it celebrated the birth of Christ by a series of tableaux, including the "Three Wise Men and the Shepherds," the latter group including a real live dog, all the other parts being taken by children between three and six years of age. Lincoln's birthday was celebrated on February 12 with appropriate exercises. The room was decorated with flags and pictures of the great emancipator, and the songs, tableaux and stories centred about the great American.

The longer I watch the effect of the kindergarten training on the mind and heart of the negro, the more wonder I feel at the comparatively small amount of attention given to this kind of education. The negro is peculiarly susceptible to the educational idea founded by Froebel. He is naturally musical. His movements are rhythmic. He is naturally deft with his fingers. He lends himself, so to speak, to every phase of a true kindergarten training. We have found this to be so true in our kindergarten experience, that we are now ready to say, after fifteen years' constant trial, that a kindergarten school for negroes in every district, in every town where they are found in numbers over a thousand, would be of incalculable benefit in the way of fundamental training for future safe and useful citizenship. Habits of cleanliness, of kindness to animals and to people, of politeness, of obedience, of reverence, of thoughtfulness, and of Christian character, are a part of the kindergarten school life.

We naturally feel proud of the medals which have actually doing. The constant theme of these mothers is the betterment of the home, and the work of our mission will be practically over, so far as we are concerned, when the people themselves have established in permanent form the home and family life.

In addition to the kindergarten and the league, the mission also sustains a free reading-room and library, open five nights a week, for the boys and girls in the district. This is constantly used and the circulating library is a steady and constant source of education. This is the only room in the neighborhood open in the evening for the young people. This work is still carried on by private contributions, and to any friends of the negro who are hopeful of his development, and willing to assist toward a higher manhood and citizenship, may I say briefly that I shall be glad to receive and use whatever they may choose to send towards the work. We look for the final emancipation of the negro in America along the line of Christian education and development. There is no solution for the difficulties between the races except that which is furnished by the spirit of Christ, and in our work in the mission we look forward to the time when this settlement shall be effected. The problem is not a negro problem.

It is simply a human problem. We have no race question in America; it is all a human question. We can forget all kinds of prejudice when once our lives are filled with the love of Christ.

most pleasant, fascinating impressions if you do not see them too often. And surely a woman has to be a very repellant specimen of a sloven if she cannot dress up and make herself attractive for a couple of hours a week during the time her lover is with her. And yet it is upon this slight and meagre acquaintance that some of the momentous partnerships of marriage are entered into for better or for worse. Do you wonder that so many of the marriages are failures, and are truly made for the worse? Do you wonder that so many people look upon marriage as a lottery where a man does not know whether he will draw as a prize a bee that will gather honey, or a wasp that finds her chief delight in thrusting a merciless sting?

Philip Henry's Children

And if it is difficult for a man to select the right kind of a wife, how much more difficult for a woman to make the right choice of a husband! A woman seems to be entirely helpless. Her danger is greater, and the results to her at least may be even more tragic. A man may make a success in spite of an unhappy marriage; but when a woman marries a man beneath her, she inevitably drops to the husband's level, and there is hardly an exception to the rule. Now when men and women go courting what should they do? The most important act is to go to God in prayer. God would select for Isaac a Rebecca, and for Jacob a Rachel; surely he will select for you a marital companion and make no mistake. Philip Henry used to say to his children, "Please God and you will please me." Then at the wedding he would say, "Others wish you all happiness. I wish you all holiness, then there is no doubt you will have all happiness." Was it a foolish caution? If we please God are we not sure to make the right move when we plight our troth under the orange blossoms? We have often heard ministers plead with wives to pray for their erring husbands. If some ministers would teach their people to pray before they entered the marital yoke, there would not be so many erring husbands to pray for, nor so many broken-hearted wives.

But where should we make prayerful selections more earnest and intense than in our church work? If there is any one place set apart for the purpose of prayer and for the demonstrations of the power of prayer, that place should be the church of God. And yet I am amazed to find how often a church in the crises of its history neglects prayer. And this fact is never more demonstrated than in the way the average church goes about to select a pastor.

Now, how does the average church select a new pastor? First, the congregation chooses a committee to look out for a suitable candidate. This committee sends its invitations to different ministers to ask them to supply the pulpit. The candidates come before the congregation and preach their trial sermons. The congregation is divided into factions or cliques. One faction likes one candidate because he has curly hair and creases in his trousers, and has a winning smile and is good-looking. Another faction favors another man because he is endowed with a fine voice and has perfect elocution. Another candidate is rejected because he is past fifty and the church wants a young man. And so the see-sawing goes on until at last a man comes along who sweeps everything by storm. He has a genius for getting calls. He has four or five good sermons. He has spent weeks and months upon them. Like the mosaics of the Alhambra, those sermons are

A Patchwork of Sermons

It would not be so bad if that minister had made them a mosaic of his own discourses; but sometimes they are taken from the sermons of other men. "We must have this minister and have him right away," cries the congregation. "Wait," says some old, conservative elder; "you do not know yet who this man is. Let us investigate a little further. It is not the first sermon or the tenth, but what kind of a sermon a man can preach after he has been in a pulpit for five years, that decides whether he is a good preacher or not. Then let us find out what kind of a Christian leader this man is. Will he be a true guide? Is he right upon the doctrine of the Atonement? Does he gamble at progressive euchre parties? Does he drink and dance and go to the theatre? If he does, we do not want him, even though he has the golden lips of a Chrysostom. Let us pray over this matter a little while. If we ask God to lead us, he will not let us make a mistake." Is the old elder right? Shall we not ask God to lead us when we are about to choose a new pastor?

But if we are to lead the right Christian life, we must ask God what we shall do for others, as well as what others shall do for us. "Oh, I cannot do anything to help a person or to lead a troubled soul to him." Is that so, my brother! Are you not doing yourself an injustice? The reason most of us have never done anything for Christ is because most of us have never tried. We have not the desire, therefore we have done nothing for him. We do not strive, therefore we do not achieve.

Work For All

What have you ever tried to do for God? Whom have you ever tried to lead to the Master? What aching heart have you tried to heal? Have you ever gone to God in prayer and asked him to guide you on a Gospel mission, and show you where you ought to work in his name? It was very important for the disciples to ask whom they should select for the vacant position in the Apostolate; but it was just as important for each one of those disciples to make the prayer like that Paul offered on the Damascus road, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" If you get down on your knees and earnestly pray to God for a position in his army, on the battle line, there is no doubt he will detail you for active work. Pray earnestly that God will open to you unlimited fields of Gospel usefulness. "And they prayed and said: Thou, Lord, which knowest the hearts of all men, shew whether of these two thou hast chosen." We are Gospel soldiers, and we must go to our divine Commander for marching orders. When you once swear your allegiance to him, you are never to make a move in life, no matter what it may be, unless you first kneel down and implore the blessing and guidance of God. In your daily communication with God are you willing to do as did Matthew Henry's father? The boy was very sick. The father said, "If the Lord will be pleased to grant me this request, I will not say, as do the beggars at my door: 'I will never ask anything of God again'; but on the contrary he shall hear me oftener than ever, and I will love God better as long as I live." Are you willing from now on to walk in such close communion with God that you will never cease to ask him what he wants you to do, and that your chief pleasure in life will be to find out his will and to accept and obey it cheerfully?

A TRAGEDY IN THE PHILIPPINES

ARRIVING in the Philippines we found that sad news was awaiting us. We send you the story of the facts, so that you may be helped to appreciate how much the gift of the mission boat El Heraldo Cristiano will mean to these persecuted islanders, as it will bear to them the encouraging presence of their

By Mrs. E. W. Jansen

The Gospel was being accepted in Oslob and other neighboring towns. In Oslob alone, three hundred persons had declared their faith in Christ, and their lives were bearing witness to the pure and uplifting power of the Gospel. The priests and those under their influence had done all in their power to hinder the advance of the Saviour's teachings. The converts suffered stonings and countless indignities, as well as loss of employment in many cases, and imprisonments and threatened death.

In Santander, it was decided to build a church, and the converts erected a suitable building for their simple services. The Sunday was agreed on for the dedication of the church, and the friends in Oslob with Pastor Ricardo were invited. According to the testimony of several of the priest's parishioners, the Sunday before dedication he ordered his people to come armed to mass the next Sabbath. That week his people spent in sharpening their bolos, as was proved by what followed. Those who had not native weapons obtained or else made them. All went on Sunday morning to their church armed for the carrying out of the priest's orders.

That Sunday morning much prayer and praise went up to God from the simple trusting souls gathered in the new church, and hearts beat stronger with faith and determination to live for the praise and glory of their Saviour, whose teachings and spirit had brought love and peace into their hearts and homes. Some of the people were much impressed by the words of their loved teacher, he told them that, though he felt there was trial of faith awaiting him, yet even if he should be called to lay down his life for the faith, he was unspeakably thankful to God that he had received the Gospel.

With no thought of impending danger, the Christians returned to their homes with their children by their side. The native pastor and other guests were sought to make their escape. Their thought was to find shelter in Oslob, but twelve miles distant.

Only a little distance was covered when Ricardo's strength began to fail him. He said to his friend that they must go on and not linger for him, he could not proceed. At this moment a man on horseback drew near. He was friendly to the Protestants and knew Ricardo. At the request of the exhausted man's friends, he dismounted and gave Ricardo his horse. The hope of getting help for the endangered people seemed to give him strength, and he hastened to Oslob; but the mayor refused to send help to the people in danger, and Ricardo wired to the American missionaries in Cebu of the urgent need.

The other escaping people, mostly women and children, reached Oslob, bringing the news that one of the number had been hacked to pieces. Next morning the constabulary's launch arrived, and took the refugees from Santander back with them to their village. Some little children were missing and the sorrow of many hearts was intense. Ricardo and the friends who had been with him were also taken back to the village. Dr. Graham, of the mission in Cebu, was on board, and his presence gave the people some comfort.

Many came back to ruined homes. The desolation which met their gaze in the morning sunlight was terrible. Five homes lay in ruins.

They went on toward their church, the constabulary with their officer, and the medical missionary and the captain of the vessel leading the way. When about a hundred yards from the church they saw the body of the murdered man lying in a pool of blood. The head had been nearly severed from the trunk, and gaping wounds in the body bore witness to the ferocious fury of the priest and his helpers. By the side of the mutilated corpse the poor wife was standing silent. She had watched there through the long afternoon and night to keep the animals away from all that was left her of her beloved husband. The horror and sadness of the scene brought tears to the eyes of the officers and men.

The converts in Cebu City have collected some money which they sent to the poor widow and her children. All are full of thankfulness that no more lives were lost. One of the villagers informing the priest that the desired deed was done, saying to him, "Father, I have killed one of your men," the priest is reputed to have answered, "Good! And if you had killed ten, you need fear nothing, for no harm would come to you."

The offending priest has had passed on him a sentence of seventeen years' imprisonment and a fine. But as he has appealed his case and is let out on bail, we fear that the troubles are not over for the poor Cebuans.

[The mission boat El Heraldo Cristiano is now almost in readiness to be sent to the Philippines. She is a trim and serviceable craft, and will be a great aid to the workers there. Funds are needed to complete certain parts of her equipment and also to cover cost of transportation. fellow Christians, both native and foreign. We are assured that you will all try to assist in making it possible to keep this boat going from town to town and from island to island on its deeds of mercy.

Last October a petition was brought to the Cebu missionaries from the village of Santander. It was signed by 185 persons, who begged to have an evangelist sent to them. The condition of affairs in this town was so awful that the petitioners seemed to fear that the document might be looked upon as a bait to entrap the evangelist, so they had added to it the sworn signatures of three of its principal men.

Two years before this petition was brought to the missionaries, 300 of the villagers had separated themselves from the Church of Rome. This was probably in part due to the tyranny of the priests. The fear of the parishioners who remained under the priests' control appeared to be absolutely abject. The native pastor, Ricardo, was living some ten or twelve miles from Santander, so he arranged to help the people by visiting and holding service for them. From among the seekers forty were accepted as candidates for baptism. About 250 others were kept waiting that they might receive further instruction before confessing their faith in the Saviour by baptism. Among these was a man of remarkably simple and strong Christian faith. His gentle spirit won him the love of all who knew him.

provided with refreshments, which were prepared for them in the three largest houses. While all the friends were at dinner, some persons rushed to the house where Ricardo and others were seated, and in terrified words, told them that a mob of three hundred armed men, led by the priest, was hurrying to kill them. The word was passed to all to flee, and men, women and children

CHINA'S AWAKENING*

THE important edicts issued by the Chinese Government come nearer, says The Missionary Review, "to placing Chinese Christians upon an equality with their non-Christian fellow subjects." It also rightly lays the blame for past troubles on the local officials, through their failure to act impartially. The issue of such a liberal edict indicates a great change in the attitude of the Chinese Court and Government toward Christianity. The higher officials are now ordered to put together the articles regarding Christianity in China's treaties with other nations, and issue them in the form of a booklet for the information and guidance of local officials throughout the empire, who must make a thorough study of them."

Converts and non-converts are alike the children of the Emperor, and alike amenable to the laws. Those who break those laws must be punished according to the laws without regard to their being Christians or non-Christians. Evil men who spread ill rumors and seek to stir up strife for their own selfish ends must be sternly dealt with; so also must those officials who act partially toward one side or the other.

"The Empress Dowager has also lately issued a proclamation calling upon all viceroy, governors and men in power to treat justly the representatives from all the Western nations, and see that all are protected in their lawful callings. God's people have abundant cause to rejoice and give thanks for the wide-open door in China. 'The Lord of Hosts is with us: the God of Jacob is our refuge.'"

A missionary of the China Inland Mission reports genuine progress in her sphere. She says: "Looking back on the past year we have every reason to thank God and take courage, for though it has been a year of very severe testing God has not only enabled the Christians to stand true to him but has also deepened and broadened the spiritual life of many." The same testimony with few exceptions comes from other provinces of China.

How He Views the Premiums

Dear Dr. Klopsch: The Red Letter Bible and Calendar both received in excellent order, and I congratulate you on the beautiful Bible you have published. Paper, type, binding, references, maps, are all praiseworthy and should appeal to the most critical taste. Every lover of art will delight in welcoming the Calendar.

FANNY CROSBY AT EIGHTY-EIGHT

Old and Blind, the World's Best Beloved Hymn Writer Sends a Birthday Message Through "The Christian Herald"

SHE came into the room almost noiselessly, but with a bright smile and a cheery greeting. A slender little woman, in a black silk gown that fell about her in soft folds. Her delicate hands clasped a little red-covered New Testament which she opened from time to time, as though she were going to read from it.

But Fanny Crosby has never read. Only for a brief period were her eyes opened upon the objects of this world. Then an accident closed them, and since that day she has lived in a world of mental visions. One would not dare to call her blind. She has seen far more than many whose eyes are wide open.

"You have a pleasant home," I said; "so bright and cheerful."

"Isn't it nice?" she replied enthusiastically. "I just love the sunshine!"

"That's the reason you reflect so much of it, I guess." She laughed—a gay, free, childlike laugh.

"Come and see my room," she said; "it's just the prettiest, most comfortable place you ever saw. They're so good to me," she went on as she led the way carefully and threw open the door to the bedroom.

"There," she said triumphantly, "isn't that nice? See all my pictures and all my things about me!"

It was pleasant, exquisitely dainty, and decorated with bright pictures.

During the few hours I spent with her, I was continually impressed, almost startled with her wonderful alertness of mind, and her reference to things and people as though she had seen them. There is scarcely a thing about her to tell of her misfortune save her dark glasses, and her careful movements when she walks about.

"How did you happen to come to Bridgeport?" I asked.

"My niece and her family lived here," she replied. "Tell Dr. Klopsch, if he wants to see a clean, pretty little country place, to come here in the spring when it's all fresh and budding and warm. I'll shake hands with him twice if he will come."

"Indeed I'll tell him. You must enjoy having young people about you."

"I should say I did. I want to tell you about my nephew. He's the youngest. He's a limb, I can tell you! We're great friends. They laugh at me because I always stand up for him. Now I want to tell you what he did. I call it a fine point of honor. The other night at supper, there were two pieces of cake gone off the cake plate. Circumstantial evidence pointed to me, for I was the only one sitting in the room; yet I hadn't risen from my chair. There was quite a bit of discussion about it. I said, 'It looks as if I was the guilty party.' Then my nephew spoke up: 'Aunt Fanny didn't take it,' he said, 'I did it myself.' He wouldn't let the suspicion rest on me. He's the brightest boy; only fourteen and always asking me the deepest questions about religion and philosophy."

"You really have everything you want, haven't you?" I asked.

"Everything," she answered softly, "everything. I am very happy. You know I made up my mind when I was a little girl that I wasn't going to let my affliction keep me from being happy. I wrote a little verse when I was eight years old. This is it:

Oh, what a happy soul am I!
Although I cannot see,
I am resolved that in this world
Contented I will be.
How many blessings I enjoy
That other people don't!
To weep and sigh, because I'm blind,
I cannot, and I won't!

"What things stand out most clearly in thinking over the experiences of your life, Miss Crosby?"

"First—oh, that was wonderful—first beginning to learn the Bible by heart. When I was eight years old, I knew the first four books. I never learned to read with my fingers. I just committed to memory. I know the New Testament well enough to teach it to others. Others have to go and get their book, but I have mine always with me. I can recite long poems, too."

Her friends say that Miss Crosby knows her own thousands of verses also, and they cannot confuse her as to any line she has ever composed, although her writing has extended over the whole length of her life. She has written for Biglow and Main alone 5,400 hymns (not all of which have been published) and at least 1,000 others for Kirkpatrick, Sweeney and other composers. Her beautiful hymn, "Saved by Grace," was written two years before it was published, and it aroused a furore of enthusiasm when she recited it for the first time at Northfield. She has used over 200 "pen-names" in her productions. Her words are sung all over the world, and many of her hymns will live, as those of Wesley have done. She will be eighty-eight on the twenty-fourth of March.

"When I was fifteen, I went to the New York Institution for the Blind. It was just at the beginning of the work of education for the blind. I had learned to play on the guitar and that had calloused my fingers so that I could not use the raised letters. The fingers have to be very sensitive to read, you know. So I was taught, as I had been before, through memory. Then they discovered my gift for making verses and gave me the very best education possible to help me to write. We traveled a great deal in those years. We went to Albany to ask the legislature for an appropriation for the Institution, and then we went through many of the towns of the State, giving entertainments and interesting the people in the work. I remember riding on the canal-boat. The steersman and the driver became great friends of mine, and they used to pick fruit for me from the orchards along the tow-path, and "Once, when President Polk was visiting us, I asked him if he did not wish to look over our grounds. They were very beautiful then, extending along Thirty-fourth Street and Tenth Avenue. Now I understand the city has crowded in on them. President Polk said he would be pleased to walk about. We started and had walked a little way when an old servant, who had been very good to me, came to say good-by, as she was going to leave. I asked the President to excuse me for a moment while I spoke to her. When I returned to him, I explained what had called me away and begged him to pardon me.

"You did just right—just right, Miss Crosby," he said. "Those who stoop to be kind to others below their station, will be rewarded. You did just right." He was a fine man—a very fine man.

"Martin Tupper, the English poet, was once the guest of the Institution. He was asked to recite some of his own verses. He began, said a few lines, then forgot. I prompted him. He said a few more, then forgot and I had to prompt him again. When this had happened a third time, he turned and said, 'Miss Crosby, I wish you would finish; you seem to know my poems much better than I do.'"

Our talk was interrupted by the arrival of the photographer who was to take Miss Crosby's birthday picture for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. He was an old friend of hers, and she greeted him very gaily. A good many jokes passed between them and a lively discussion of town affairs, on which Miss Crosby seemed to be fully informed. In fact, she seemed to know and to be interested in the affairs of the whole world.

She was much entertained by the picture-taking process, and almost childlike in the simplicity with which she obeyed. When we asked her if it tired her, she scoffed at the idea. She rallied her friend the photographer on the many times he had taken her without flattering her greatly, and told him this time he must certainly catch her with a pleasant expression.

While she was busy discussing a big convention she had attended the year before, and the Grand Army post to which he belonged and before which she had recited some of her poems not long ago, I asked her niece if she was always so sunshiny and so quick. Miss Crosby, the niece assured me, was always the same. Even when her sister, who had been her constant companion and helper in all her work, passed away a few years ago, she did not grieve. Her perfect faith in God and the immortality of the soul and the impossibility of permanent separation from those she loved sustained and cheered her. Her nephews and nieces read to her a great deal from books and magazines, so that she keeps in touch with what is happening all over the world. She is delighted with the gifts that come to her now and then from admirers in many parts of the globe. She enjoys the visits of friends, and has been looking forward to her birthday celebration with the greatest pleasure.

"I haven't told you half about the splendid people I have known in my life," she said, when we were alone again. "There was Mr. Bradbury, Mr. Sankey, Mr. Biglow and, most remarkable of all, Sylvester Main. I had known him when I was a little girl, as he lived in the next town to ours. He used to lead the singing when the children gathered on the green in the summer twilight; but I had not seen him for many years until I met him in Mr. Bradbury's office in 1864. I never shall forget him. His son, Hubert, has been a firm friend of mine many years; but I always say, 'Oh, you can never be as good as your father was!'"

"Is it easy for you to remember people after you have met them once? Would you know me if I came again?"

"Yes, I think so. Sometimes, when I have been introduced to a number of people at once, I have not been able to recall them; but that's a pretty severe test. It's the voice first, of course, that I recall. My seeing is all done within, you know. And I do see many, many things, often beautiful faces and beautiful eyes. Once, years ago, I had such a wonderful dream. I was walking beside a clear river with a spirit or an angel guide. On the other side of the river were beautiful trees, perfect ones, with no sign of age or decay; and under the trees people were walking, and they were bring it to me. You know that's always been the trouble, I've been petted and spoiled."

I laughed very heartily.

"I don't believe it has hurt you at all," I said. "You have traveled quite a bit, haven't you?"

"Yes, especially at that time. I went to Washington twice to interest Congress in educating the blind. I was the first woman who ever spoke before that body. I have been to Cincinnati several times, usually to collaborate with Mr. W. H. Doane. He was such a splendid man! Isn't Cincinnati a wonderful city? all up and down hill. Mr. Doane lived 'way up high on Mount—Mount—"

"Auburn?"

"Yes, that was it. And you went up and down on the cable cars."

"You must have met a great many famous people, Miss Crosby."

"Yes, yes, indeed. Henry Clay was the greatest. He was a wonderful man. Oh, such charming manners! He came to the Institution and I was selected to welcome him with a poem. He had lost his son six months before in the Mexican War and I had sent him some verses. So after I read my verses of welcome, he stepped forward and said, 'This is not the first poem for which I am indebted to this lady. She has already sent me some lines on the death of my dear son.' It was said so tenderly that I cried. He shed a few tears, but was able to recover himself; but I had hard work. I shall never forget that."

The Collinwood Disaster

IN the frightful sacrifice of life by the burning of the schoolhouse at Collinwood, near Cleveland, O., there is a lesson which may well be heeded by the authorities in many districts throughout the country. According to the reports, the Collinwood school building was a structure of the old-fashioned type, with all too narrow hallways, and with exits that were totally inadequate in an emergency where the quick emptying of the school became a matter of life or death. Narrow staircases, cramped exits, and doors that are said to have been hung to swing inward instead of outward, all helped to swell the disaster and made the building a death-trap for the hundreds of children within its walls.

This appalling calamity should be a wholesome warning to school trustees in towns and villages. It should prompt them to take effective measures to ensure the safety of pupils in case of fire or panic. The Collinwood school had been examined; but, although its defects were known, apparently no effort was made to remedy them. Whether it was a case of false economy or simply stupid, criminal neglect, or both, will probably appear during the investigation.

Tax-payers, especially in rural districts, should see to it that their school trustees make ample provision for the safety of the children under their care, and that any radical defects, such as those that existed in the Collinwood school, should not be permitted to be overlooked through false motives of economy.

In these days of improved construction, every school building, church, opera house or other place of public assemblage should be made fireproof. Where hundreds of human lives are at stake, municipalities cannot afford to be parsimonious in providing modern safeguards. School boards especially have a heavy responsibility in this respect, and as we read the heartrending story of the immolation of the hundred and sixty helpless little victims at Collinwood, we are impressed with the conviction that he who is indifferent to the safety of a little child, and exposes it to death or danger, is a criminal indeed.

THE problem of the unemployed appears to be tending in increased degree to a problem of migration. A contractor in New Orleans announces that he could employ several thousand men, and that throughout Louisiana there is a general dearth of labor, and from rural districts there are complaints that laborers are scarce. These facts should be made known and aid should be rendered to any unemployed men in the cities who are able and willing to work in the country. Obviously, however, these opportunities do not meet the whole difficulty. There are many men walking the streets of our great cities seeking employment, who could not do the work offered for physical reasons. Some of them who could do it, shrink from it because they have a specialty that is more valuable than mere physical strength. The man who has been trained to do work requiring skill and delicacy of touch, feels that he is throwing away the years in which he acquired his skill, when he takes up the pick and shovel. He hopes that if he can hold out a little longer, there will be a demand for his work—the work that he can do better than other men.

Nor would it be a good thing for the country to turn the skilled laborer into the unskilled. But if the unemployed men of physical strength could be helped to leave the cities, where work is scarce, for the country where it is plentiful, the numbers of the needy would be reduced. When the revival in their special kinds of industry comes, they would be sure to hear of it and could return, unless, as might happen, they had made themselves so useful to their country employer as to find it to their advantage to remain. Even the Princeton professor who crossed the continent working his own way as an unskilled laborer was frequently offered on the farms an inducement of good wage that, while not attractive to a professor, would be gladly accepted by a laborer, and would be far better than the precarious employment now obtainable in the crowded cities.

Would it not be possible for churches and philanthropists to raise a fund for the purpose of migration?

To aid the worker to reach a place where he is needed would surely be better, both for him and the community, than to give him charity in the city, and would really be cheaper in the end. The country itself would thus become a vast employment bureau, the cities would no longer be congested and many a man would gain in health the vigor he is now losing by insufficient food and a tainted atmosphere.

Japan Sends Thanks

OUR Ambassador to Japan, the Hon. Thomas J. O'Brien, sends the following official communication to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

"AMERICAN EMBASSY, TOKYO, February 7, 1908.

"Gentlemen:—Subsequent to the famine in Japan, of 1905, the following sums, collected by your publication, were sent to the Japanese Government through this Embassy—the dates herewith being those upon which the Embassy received its telegraphic instructions from the Department of State:

Feb. 16,	$10,000 (yen 20,050.13)	Transmitted through Red Cross.
Feb. 23,	$10,000 (yen 20,050.13)	Transmitted through Red Cross.
Mar. 9,	$10,000 (yen 20,100.50)	Transmitted through Red Cross.
Mar. 17,	$50,000 (yen 100,502.51)	Transmitted through Red Cross.

Mar. 31,	$25,000 (yen 50,251.26)	Transmitted through Red Cross.
Apr. 7,	$25,000 (yen 50,251.26)	One-half sent to Sendai and one-half to Minister for Foreign Affairs.
Apr. 27,	$25,000 (yen 50,251.26)	One-half sent to Sendai and one-half to Minister for Foreign Affairs.
May 11,	$25,000 (yen 50,251.26)	Transmitted through Count Matsukata.
Mar. 7,	$ 5,000 (yen 10,052.25)	Sent direct to Foreign Committee, Sendai (Davison).

"This Embassy is now in receipt of a communication from the office of the Miyagi Prefecture, stating that the three Prefectures concerned are desirous of expressing their appreciation to the individuals contributing these sums, and requesting that the name and address of each of these (with a note of the amount contributed in each case), be secured for them.

"In case a record of these details has been preserved, I will be glad if a copy can be put at the disposal of the Embassy.

"I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant, (Signed) "T. J. O'BRIEN, Ambassador.
"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York City."

As upwards of eighty-five thousand individuals sent in their gifts through this journal for the relief of the famine sufferers, it would be obviously impracticable to carry out the plan indicated in Ambassador O'Brien's letter, of forwarding to each contributor the appreciation of the Japanese Prefectures. Further, we believe that our readers and their friends who rendered this valuable service to Japan, would not desire it. What they did for the sake of Christ and humanity finds its reward in the work itself and in the approval of their own consciences.

In their behalf THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sends greeting to the Japanese Prefectures. May the black shadow of famine never again darken the thresholds of their homes.

A Great Missionary Gone

IN the death of the Rev. Jacob Chamberlain at Madanapalli, India, lately, the Christian world loses one of its grandest missionaries. Dr. Chamberlain for many years shared with the late John Paton, the "apostle of the New Hebrides," the honor of being one of the oldest and ablest workers in the foreign field. At the time of his death, at the age of seventy-three, he had been nearly half a century in active missionary service.

These fifty years have witnessed a marvelous transformation in the heathen world. In that time India has been opened up everywhere to the Gospel. China has been invaded throughout nearly all her provinces by the pioneers of the Cross. Japan, Corea, Siam, Burma, practically the whole of Africa, Malaysia and the numerous groups of islands in the great South Sea Archipelago have come under the banner of Christ.

Dr. Chamberlain was a man of magnificent equipment for his high vocation. To ripe scholarship he added a wide acquaintance with the native languages, and with the habits and customs of the people among whom his life was cast. Author, physician, theologian, linguist, he made all his accomplishments tributary to his desire for winning souls. Surely it can be said of such a man as Jacob Chamberlain, that he was one of those of whom the prophet Daniel wrote: "They that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars for ever and ever."

The Government and the Anarchists

THERE are indications that the Federal Government has at last decided to adopt effective measures for keeping anarchists out of the country, and for deporting those who may succeed in coming here. This decision is prompted by the recent attack on Chicago's Chief of Police, although it may not have been the outcome of anarchist plottings, but the act of an individual without accomplices.

Whatever may develop later in the Chicago inquiry, it is evident that the time has arrived when some emphatic stand should be taken to prevent the admission of alien disturbers and terrorists from foreign lands. With this view, Secretary Strauss, of the Department of Commerce and Labor, has directed all Commissioners of Immigration and immigrant inspectors to take vigorous necessary measures for the detection of immigrant anarchists with a view to their deportation, and to co-operate with the Secret Service for that purpose. While there is no disposition on the part of the authorities to restrict immigration in the general sense, it is intended that alien disturbers of the peace who have acquired a bad record in their own countries shall not have the privilege of coming to this free republic. This applies specifically to all advocates of violence or those who are opposed to our government, or to government and law generally.

In the Immigration Act of February 20, 1907, the term "anarchist" is clearly defined and power is conferred upon the authorities to exclude those who come under that classification. Heretofore the attitude of our government has been a very generous one, and except in extraordinary cases, there has been no attempt to enforce the law of exclusion. This was partly due to the fact that, under the existing law, actual deportation is a difficult matter; but it is not improbable that additional legislation may be had during the present session of Congress, remedying these defects and enabling the authorities to carry out the purpose of the Act of 1907.

Quarrel Over a Railroad

MUTUAL jealousies of the European Powers have again been stirred by the revival of the interminable Eastern question in a new form. An apparently innocent project on the part of the Austrian Government to construct a railroad through a wedge of Turkish territory to the sea has set the statesmen of Europe by the ears. The proposed line of railroad was to run from Sarajevo to Mitrovitz, connecting here with an existing line to Salonica on the coast. The line would obviously be a commercial and social convenience, and the Sultan of Turkey gave a cheerful consent to the construction. But Russia perceived in the project a deep-laid plot inimical to her interests, and contended that Germany was backing Austria for reasons of her own. She complained that the privilege Turkey had granted to Austria had been sought and denied to her. She too wanted a line of railroad through Turkish territory, which would connect Odessa with the Adriatic at Antivari, thus making her independent of the passage to the sea through the Dardanelles. The privilege of putting that line had been refused to Russia by the Austro-Sultan, while Austria had been favored. Russia hinted that advantage was being taken of her embarrassment resulting from her defeat by Japan, and contended that Germany would not have prompted Austria to launch the project, if she had not supposed that Russia might be defied with impunity. Russia proposed to show that she was still able to protect her interests, and would forbid the Austrian project, unless she had permission to proceed with her own. While this dispute is occupying the rulers and statesmen, the people who would be benefited by the construction of the railroad must wait until the various dynastic interests are adjusted. The situation indicates how great will be the change in international conditions in that future time predicted by the prophets when Christ shall reign, and mutual jealousies shall cease.

Ephraim shall not envy Judah; and Judah shall not vex Ephraim. (Isa. 11: 13.)

Hypnotism Causes Crime

Deep interest has been aroused throughout Germany by a crime that has now become doubly sensational through the suicide of the criminal. The bare recital of facts given to the press stated that a distinguished officer of the German army shot and killed a major of the same army in the latter's own house. Friends of the murderer exerted themselves to have him acquitted on the ground of insanity, but there was overwhelming evidence of his being sane and he was convicted. Realizing what a disgrace to his exalted family and to his uniform his execution as a common murderer would be, he committed suicide with a knife he had secreted during the momentary inattention of his guard. To a noted physician who, posing as a criminal, was locked up with him, the murderer explained his crime a few hours before committing suicide. He had conceived a mad love, he said, for his victim's wife, and though he knew her to have lived an erratic life, he had fallen so completely under her fascination that he was hypnotized and would cheerfully have betrayed his country, his mother, or his friends, had she desired it. She wanted none of those things, but did want her husband killed, and he obeyed her. It is difficult to understand how so honorable a man could have become so infatuated. But his is not the first or only instance of inordinate affection. Even in apostolic times men were warned against such subservience.

Who changed the truth of God into a lie and worshiped and served the creature more than the Creator. (Rom. 1: 25.)

A Pedestrian's Discovery

A discovery that seemed paradoxical to his friends and astonished the young man himself, was made recently by an excursionist. He set out on a trip from Jersey City, N. J., to Norfolk, Va. For reasons readily understood by young men of his kind at the present time, he resolved to walk the whole distance there and back. He thought he could bear the labor and the loss of time better than he could the expense of traveling on the cars. His friends were astonished to learn that he had finished the journey by rail and still more astonished to hear from him that he had adopted that course to save money. He said he had walked the first half of the journey, covering more than three hundred miles. It had taken him thirteen days and his expenses for board and lodging on the way had been over thirty dollars. The second half of the trip had been made on a fast express in twelve hours, at a cost of eight dollars—thus proving that riding had been cheaper for him than walking. All the toil and labor of the long journey had been incurred in addition to loss of money, when an easier and cheaper way was open to him, which at last he perceived. Such a discovery has been made by many who sought to win eternal life by penances, gifts and pilgrimages, instead of accepting the simple and easy way God has provided.

To him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness. (Rom. 4: 5.)

His Ashes on the Sea

During the steamship Lucania's recent eastward passage a woman passenger scattered an urn full of ashes overboard in mid-Atlantic. She obtained a certificate from the captain showing that she had done so, together with the time and the latitude and longitude. She said the ashes were those of the cremated remains of a prominent New York business man, who had directed that they be thus disposed of, and who specified the Lucania, which was his favorite steamer, as the ship they were to be thrown from. The time for the scattering of the ashes had been previously arranged, so that the man's relatives could simultaneously attend a memorial service in New York. The dead man's ideas were the exact opposite of those of the ancient Egyptians. Their concern was to preserve the dead body from perishing, while his was to annihilate it as far as could be done. Neither course is of any importance except from a sentimental standpoint; the real object of concern is what will become of the soul. The Christian has no reason for doubt in that matter.

I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day. (II. Timothy 1: 12.)

To Exclude Anarchists

The recent attempt to murder the chief of police in Chicago has led to active measures being taken to break up anarchistic societies in that and other cities. Clues obtained from the dead anarchist's belongings have been followed, and it is now declared that he was simply the agent of a society. He had no grievance against the police officer he attempted to kill, but belonged to a society of anarchists that had condemned the officer to death and needed an agent to execute its will. There appears to have been a meeting at which lots were drawn, and the lot to kill the police officer fell to this young Jew, who had come but lately from Kishineff in Russia. That city was the scene of the terrible massacres of his co-religionists, yet his escape and coming here had not taught him the duties of good citizenship, and the anarchists found in him a suitable tool. The effort to root out anarchism here does not fully express the indignation of the public. It is now proposed to draw tighter the lines of exclusion at our ports. Inspectors of immigration are directed not only to exclude anarchists with a record, but persons who hold anarchistic beliefs. The Government evidently thinks that persons who have anarchistic beliefs will act upon them. It is a fair assumption in that case, though it does not apply in every case. There are many, for example, who believe in Christianity whose life and conduct do not express that belief.

Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven. (Matt. 7: 21.)

A Novel Sunday School

Mr. W. C. Tirrill, of Fostoria, Ohio, writes:

"Our Men's Sunday School class has 115 members; sixty-one were out last Sunday—a stormy, snowy Sunday. We have men in our class who, like myself, had not been in Sunday School for twenty years until four years ago.

"We have men, like myself, who have not missed over one Sunday in all that time. I got up a church directory to post on my billboards, so I could reach all the men all of the time, when going about the street and from meals. They stared them in the face with these words: 'Are you a Christian?' and 'Get right with God.' An excellent plan for other teachers to follow."

A PIONEER MISSIONARY AT REST

NEWS has been received from Madanapalli, India, of the death of a famous missionary, the Rev. Dr. Jacob Chamberlain, of the Dutch Reformed Church, at the ripe age of seventy-three years. Dr. Chamberlain was born in Sharon, Conn., in 1835, and had one of the most remarkable careers of any missionary in the last half century. He was, in the highest sense of the word, a pioneer, and to other notable qualifications he added those of linguist, author, theologian and physician, his whole equipment giving him a commanding influence among the native peoples among whom he labored. He is survived by a widow and six sons, one of the latter being Prof. Wm. J. Chamberlain, of New Brunswick, N. J.

Dr. Chamberlain was an American and the descendant of a family whose members were ardently devoted to Christ and deeply interested in foreign missions. Dr. Chamberlain, several years ago, in the course of some personal reminiscences, said: "I drank in the spirit of missions on my mother's breast. That sainted mother was the instrument of sending out eleven of her sons and daughters, nephews and nieces into the foreign field. I had, in young manhood, so taken in the spirit of missions that though my course in life seemed to have been definitely settled, and it had never occurred to me that I should be a missionary, I remember distinctly vowing a most solemn vow to my Master, that if he would prosper me as I thought I would be prospered, I would myself support my missionary in a foreign field, and never for a moment did I waver in that vow until the Lord turned me over into being a foreign missionary. And when I had, with my mother's and my father's blessing, consecrated myself, and was leaving for the foreign field, I then learned for the first time that my mother, as her first act after the birth of her eldest son, had placed me before the Lord and vowed that I should, so far as her consecration and her influence should go, be a foreign missionary."

The young man received his education at the Western Reserve College, Ohio, graduating in 1856. He then went to New Brunswick Theological Seminary and subsequently studied at the Medical College in New York, from which he received his diploma in 1859. But it was not as a physician that he was to attain the eminence which would assuredly have come to him in a path of life. His mother's prayers had been heard, the vow with which she had consecrated her boy had been accepted, and in due time the call to labor at the front came to him. He offered himself to the Board of Missions of the Reformed Dutch Church, and was appointed to its mission at Palamanair, in the Madras Presidency of India.

The field was a difficult one. Dr. Chamberlain was quick to perceive how his medical knowledge might help him to win his way as a preacher among the people. He opened a small hospital and dispensary in connection with the mission, and soon afterwards opened others at Madanapalli. Patients flocked to him, but he made it clear to them that it was as a missionary that he had come and that his medical service was but subsidiary to his Gospel work. Each ticket admitting a patient to consultation had printed on the back of it a concise statement of Christian doctrine, and when the patients had been examined and their prescriptions written, a short service of reading and prayer was held, while Dr. Chamberlain's assistant made up the prescriptions. That these services were appreciated was evident. On one day three Brahman clerks were among the patients. Knowing that they were in an office where unpunctuality was punished, Dr. Chamberlain ordered their prescriptions hurried forward, and told them that while it was the rule for patients to wait for the service, he would, under the circumstances, allow them to have their medicine and go to their office. They replied, "No, we prefer to wait for the prayer. We are not of your religion, but the God who sent you to heal us will hear your prayers, and we will wait while you pray to him."

Dr. Chamberlain continued preaching and healing year after year, with brief intervals of rest, for forty-seven years. In 1874, and again in 1884, impaired health necessitated a voyage home, but he was restless and uncomfortable until he could return to his work, in which God has signally blessed him.

army officer recalls those delightful meetings, which influenced so much for good all their lives.

The next step towards Christian fellowship was undoubtedly the founding of a branch of the Y.M.C.A. at the Academy. The object was to promote among the men of the corps the principles of right thinking, right speaking, and right acting, "as shown in the life of Jesus and clean living, characteristics which the nobility of knighthood alone is powerless to give.

A greater West Point is now being prepared; a marvel of magnificence among the Hudson highlands. Among other changes, a new chapel on the hill sup-racks some distance across the plain. Meetings of the active members are held on Sundays and also on one other day of the week, these being always well attended. In the fall of 1900, the first organization for systematic Bible study was effected. Fifteen young men of the class of 1903—then "yearlings"—under the leadership of Cadet Leeds, began the work. In July, 1901, two more classes were enrolled, the average attendance being 30. Three years after the beginning, the membership had risen to 91, divided among 14 classes, and in 1894, with 20 classes, the attendance averaged 120, since risen to over 140. No record of Christian work among the cadets would be complete without reference to the devoted labors of the present chaplain of the post and the corps, Rev. Edward S. Travers. In his study, located conveniently to the cadet barracks, Chaplain Travers is always to be found by any who may be in "sorrow, sickness, need, or other adversity." While the services in the chapel are those of the Episcopal Church, the broad spirit of Christian liberality pervades them, and clergymen and laymen of other denominations often occupy the pulpit. Not only are the ministrations of the chaplain designed for the corps of cadets, but also for the large number of officers and their families, and the still larger number of men in the ranks, and civilians, employees and others residing on the military reservation. For these a prosperous Sunday School and evening services are maintained.

The basic principle of cadet life is more than scholarship, more than manual training of the "man-at-arms"; it is the development of individual character and the elevation of the man above the sword. To the love of truth, justice and integrity is now largely joined the aspiration—further and higher—of faith and virtue

Concerning Blue Monday

EVERYBODY remembers the old Mother Goose rhyme about the two young people who were walking out one Sunday in the bravery of their best attire and the happiness of their innocent hearts, probably coming home from church, and who parted on the door-step with a sigh, saying, "To-morrow will be Monday." Nobody likes Monday. Everybody is glad when Saturday night comes. The advent of Sunday brings joy and rest alike to the grateful and reverential who spend it as it ought to be spent, and to the unthankful and the evil who trample on its holy hours. Everybody welcomes Sunday. Nobody, let it be repeated, has a specially good word for Monday. It seems to come with a little jar and shock, and most of us have to brace up, get a good grip on ourselves, and start in with determined courage unless we want Monday to be blue. In the household it is washing day, and that fact makes mistress and maid both cross and tired.

In business, men face anew the complications and embarrassments that they dropped on Saturday night. A man does not mind a disagreeable letter, if he receive it on Tuesday, nor is he half so apt to send a tart or ungracious reply to a correspondent whose letter is inopportune, on Tuesday as on Monday. "I make a point," said a sensible wife, "never to ask Harry for money on Monday morning. If Monday happens to be my shopping day, I arrange my finances to my satisfaction on Thursday or Friday."

A most amiable and complacent gentleman, the manager of a large department store, was known by his subordinates always to be perverse and irritable on a Monday, and the head of a large publishing house, generally the most considerate and charming of men, was positively morose on that day, and was avoided accordingly by every one who could arrange to keep at a distance until the day was over.

Ministers, who more than other people should be entitled to a blue Monday, or at least to a tired and exhausted Monday, Sunday being their hardest working day, are usually pleasant and cheerful then. They frequently and wisely take it as their day of relaxation. Many ministerial clubs meet on Monday morning, and not a few ministers give Monday afternoon, at least, to their wives, who have very little of their company on other days.

The temptation to be blue on any day in the week ought to be resisted with all one's might. Really there is never anything worth being blue about. Sorrow has a dignity of its own. When we mourn over the loss of a dear one or over any trouble that has overtaken one we love, we have legitimate reason for grief, but when we make a fuss and are sullen and pity ourselves and go around with a long face, speaking in monosyllables, snubbing our friends and scolding the children just because we are out of sorts and blue, we have not the slightest excuse. Ill temper may be caused by indigestion. It is pitiable, whatever causes it; all the more that in this good world there is so much to make us happy. As Stevenson puts it:

The world is so full of a number of things,
I think we should all be as happy as kings.

To suggest to the housekeeper the revolutionary idea that washing day should be deferred until Wednesday or Thursday would probably do very little good. The day appears to have fixed itself with cast-iron decision as the day for the laundry, and on Monday the laundry has the right of way. Yet there is a good deal to be said in favor of a change in the housekeeping schedule. Were Tuesday selected as washing day the matron could adjust herself to it without much inconvenience, and the looking over of soiled clothing, separating the coarser and finer pieces, and putting the linen into its preliminary soaking, could be easily accomplished on Monday evening. One excellent woman I remember, who never had fixed days for any part of her housekeeping, and who, beyond other feminine souls, enjoyed emancipation from the restraints of system. She was wont to boast that she ruled her system, such as it was, and did not permit any system to lord it over her. Although she would take her children and spend a morning on the river bank among the reeds and flowers when other women were baking and scouring, her family managed to get enough to eat, and her household moved without friction. She never had blue Mondays, nor had her husband, who, equally with herself, was absolved from regular rules, and had a habit of coming home for meals at most unseasonable hours. How they managed to live in utter comfort and perfect tranquillity in their haphazard jolly way was a puzzle to their friends; but by some secret of their own the results of their confusion were quite as fine as those of their neighbors' good order.

Anxiety about pecuniary matters naturally and almost relentlessly drives people into despondency and the blues. Mr. Micawber's famous dictum about nineteen pounds, nineteen shillings and sixpence, leaving a lucky sixpence as margin in every twenty pounds, would save many a family from distressing solicitude

A DIFFICULT FLIGHT

DESIRING to carry help to her soldier friends in the army, this good dame is driving in hot haste and is greatly vexed at her slow progress in fording a stream. Behind her on horseback, coming nearer and nearer, are men pursuing her, lest she shall give aid and comfort to the enemy. Alas, although she does not know it, her feathered freight is making its escape, her ducks and geese are taking to the water, and if she gains the opposite shore and makes good her run to the camp beyond, she will carry a much diminished store from her poultry yard. Poor old lady! How one wishes she were more fortunate!

about money, and would be a panacea for producing cheerfulness. Suppose we make it a Christian duty to have no blue Mondays.

A Leap Year Suggestion

Can it be true that Dr. Denslow Lewis, president of the Medico-Legal Society of America, seriously meant all that is implied in the assertion that it would be a good thing for home life and individuals in general if every year were leap year, and if women would propose to the men of their choice, instead of waiting for the men to propose to them? This strikes the ordinary mind as crying for reform against nature, since man must always be the seeker, and woman the sought in happy marriage. There is no surer way to stem the current of a young man's fancy than for a girl to become the open wooer, and no more certain method of piquing curiosity and awakening desire than for a maiden to wear a queenly air of indifference when suitors make advances. Yet few women will deny that there are little feminine ways of innocent coquetry that are perfectly legitimate, and that persuade men without their suspecting it to offer their homage to charming girlhood. Leap year parties create a great deal of fun, and a timid swain, too bashful to prefer his own claims, may not complain, but on the contrary be thankful, if a dear girl makes his path to happiness easier.

Ignorance or Knowledge

WHEN shall I begin to initiate my child into the mysteries of her own being? When shall I tell my little son things that he ought to know about the facts of life? These questions occur over and over in letters from mothers, and it is impossible to answer them in an arbitrary manner, or in a way that will suit each particular case. Every mother must judge for herself circumstances that surround her child. In a growing family no two children are precisely alike. One child is inquisitive and curious, another is exposed to danger through the influence of coarse or vulgar companionship, and still another is going away from home and should be shielded by maternal care from the possibility of contamination. Speaking broadly, when youth of both sexes approach the dividing line between childhood and maturity, when they confront changes in their own physical nature that must puzzle and alarm them, they ought to be told in the simplest way something about those hidden things that are not matters for common talk, and yet lie at the foundation of the race. A father may reveal to his sons what they ought to know about themselves, or a mother may properly do it, and a mother is always the one to lift the curtain for her daughters, showing them plainly and delicately that there is nothing of which to be ashamed in their physical nature, although there is much which need not be mentioned in ordinary intercourse. A little child of five or six is too young to be taught anything except modesty in speech and behavior. To allow a girl or boy to enter the teens without solicitous watchfulness for the right moment when revelation should be made of hitherto unknown secrets, is extremely foolish and cruel. Children should be enjoined from the first never to discuss on the playground or elsewhere anything that has to be concealed from the mother's ear. "I will ask mother." "I have no secrets from mother," is armor of proof for every little maiden. One great perfection of childish innocence in these days is the wholesome tendency to engage in sports and pastimes that enable both sexes to meet on terms of equality. Plenty of outdoor life and exercise, although it may sometimes be a little rough and boisterous, aids to preserve the purity of mind and thought that are desirable if young people are to grow into clean and wholesome adolescence, and later make splendid men and women.

Babies and Fresh Air

"I wrap the baby up very warmly, even to putting a quilt or blanket over her carriage, and she takes her nap out of doors even in zero weather. There is a sheltered angle of the front veranda where I carry her on windy or stormy days, and I should feel as if I had committed a sin by allowing a single day to pass when she was not out in the fresh air for at least two hours."

This is the modern way of making infants physically strong. Another mother who is too busy to take all the time she would like for wheeling a baby carriage out of doors, dresses her little one from top to toe in folds of very warm clothing, and puts him in a room with the windows open to take his daily nap. Babies brought up to breathe fresh air, do not take cold so easily or so often as those babies who are constantly coddled. These fresh air babies, too, are by no means fed whenever they cry. They are fed at intervals regulated by the clock, and everything that can possibly bring to them a malefic germ is sterilized with the greatest care. We have been told that every infant is born into the world with a certain capital of health. Too many babies are so badly brought up by ignorant parents that this capital is early exhausted. Mothers should do their best to give their children a good start physically, thus lessening the peril of disease, and in a way giving them immunity from contagion. With both babies and grown-ups, exhausted vitality is the starting-point for a great many maladies.

Reading Shaken by a Revival

IN Reading, Pa., thousands assembled nightly during February and clamored for admission to the great Auditorium to hear Evangelist W. E. Biederwolf and his helpers, in the great revival just closed in that place. Repeatedly the street in front of the building was packed with an eager throng long before the doors opened. Twenty-nine churches had united in the call to Dr. Biederwolf. Thorough spiritual preparation had been made in every department long before the opening night. Many cottage prayer-meetings were held, pulpit exchanges made, a great chorus organized and drilled, and hundreds of personal workers selected and trained.

The revival was a success from the first meeting to the last. The Gospel was preached with power, and all classes were attracted.

Personal work was one of the most effective features. Two hundred earnest men and women were detailed for this definite work, under the leadership of Howard E. Taylor. The great chorus was another feature. Five hundred volunteers gave themselves willingly to this work. At the close of the revival, the chorus was formed into a permanent organization.

Upwards of 700 people professed conversion. Reading is distinctly a church town, eighty-five per cent. of its population, according to report, being church members; but there had been a lack of any real spiritual life, and it was among this class that the greatest work was done. Hundreds of Christians, nearly all young people, publicly declared their purpose to henceforth forego the doubtful indulgences of the world, in order that Christ might use their lives. In the last few days of the meetings many were swept into the Kingdom. Nearly a hundred decided for Christ at the great farewell service, the meeting lasting until midnight, and it was a scene that the thousands who were there will never forget.

Gracious Awakening in Reno

EVANGELISTS Bulgin and Gates lately conducted a series of Gospel meetings at Reno, Nev., which were greatly blessed. Somewhere near three hundred confessed Christ, and many more have come out since the meetings, showing that the Spirit is still moving. The campaign, for which the churches of Reno have been praying and earnestly working, was brought to a head by this revival, and an Anti-Gambling League was started. Papers were circulated and nearly a thousand names signed, asking the City Council to call a special election so that the people might have a chance to rid the city of gambling. The women formed an auxiliary and resolved to aid in every way possible. The gamblers are greatly alarmed because the churches and good people of Reno now say "they must go." The townspeople are resolved, with God's help, to make the city a better and purer place to live in, and an example to the rest of the State.

Among the Workers

EVANGELIST W. A. SUNDAY'S Gospel campaign at Bloomington, Ill., has been wonderfully blessed. It is said that over four thousand have confessed Christ at the series of meetings.

—MR. T. E. SULLIVAN, of Farmersville, O., writes: "Prohibition has made great headway here in Ohio, and only last week the legislature passed a county option law by which it is hoped to make eighty-three counties out of the eighty-eight 'dry' territory."

THE CANADIAN TEMPERANCE League is making great headway in the Dominion. At a recent public gathering in Massey Hall, Toronto, most favorable reports were presented showing the progress of temperance. Miss Grace Hildebrand was the singer of the occasion.

—THE PRISON-GATE MISSION of the Salvation Army, in December, welcomed more than one hundred released men and almost an equal number in January and February. It made temporary arrangements for the men until situations or support of some sort could be procured for them.

—DR. ALICE CONDUCT, in a recent letter from Ludhiana, India, sends most cheering accounts of the work she is accomplishing with the X-Ray machine she received from the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. She has given 2,428 treatments, and the results have delighted both doctors and patients. The Gospel is preached to all the patients.

The Christian Herald "Old Guard"

IN a recent issue of this journal, a paragraph appeared in THE MAIL-BAG referring to a letter from Mrs. L. W., of New York, an old subscriber, who wrote us that she had read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for more than twenty years without interruption. "How many such have you on your list of subscribers?" she asked. Always glad to hear from old friends, we invited a roll-call of those who had read the paper as long as this lady. To our surprise, there came a flood of replies from all parts of the country, which showed us that we have many friends who have reached Mrs. L. W.'s record, and not a few who have eclipsed it.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was founded in 1878 in New York City—just thirty years ago. We believe there are many more still on our subscription lists who began to take the paper at that time and who have continued uninterruptedly ever since.

We have given below the names of those who responded to our invitation, but they constitute only a part of the "Old Guard"—a single battalion, so to speak, of the great army of readers, now the largest of its kind, thousands of whom have marched forward in Gospel array with us from the beginning. We greet the "Old Guard" lovingly and thank them for all the kind words of encouragement and appreciation contained in their letters. May they long be spared to labor with us in advancing the cause of Christ's kingdom on earth:

A Missionary Martyr

ONE of the most pathetic of the later appeals of the late Dr. John G. Paton, the Apostle of the New Hebrides, was for the evangelization of the cannibals of the Southern Pacific. His success at Tanna and other islands proved that the Melanesians were capable of being transformed. The Presbyterians of Canada, Scotland and Australasia established a mission on Norfolk Island which became a centre of Christian influence, whence native preachers reached, not only islands of the New Hebrides group, but Banks, Torres, Santa Cruz and the Solomon Islands. The white missionary did not always accompany these expeditions, experience having taught that hostility was less likely to be provoked when none but natives were in the company. There have, however, been exceptions to the rule among the bolder spirits.

The steamer S. N. Castle, which arrived at San Francisco recently from Southern Pacific ports, brings news of a distressing tragedy in connection with one of these missionary efforts. An island of the Solomon Group, called St. George by the white men, was known to be the abode of cannibals. Rev. Alexander McLoughlin, a Scotch Presbyterian missionary, nevertheless, attempted to found a mission there. He left Pago Pago, his own station, last June, against the advice and protests of his colleagues. It was known that he arrived safely, and, apparently, was cordially welcomed. But near the close of the year, a report came that he had been attacked, and still later came the shocking news that he had been killed, and that his body had been used for a cannibal feast.

The British Government on receipt of the intelligence promptly sent a steamer to St. George to investigate. The chief of the island admitted the facts and expressed regret. He was warned that he had made the village liable to severe punishment. He pleaded for mercy and volunteered to bring the murdered missionary's bones on board, with a present of pearl shells as indemnity. On that understanding he was released, but though the steamer waited the promise was not kept. The steamer finally began the bombardment of the island. The chief promptly yielded. He sent several of his people down to the sea bearing the whitened bones of the missionary, and with them all the pearl shells in the possession of the people.

perfect, too, and it looked so peaceful and so lovely that I said to my guide, "Oh, let me cross over the river into that beautiful land." But the guide replied, "Not yet. Go back to your work. Fulfill your mission, then you may cross." So I went back and tried to be faithful over all the things that have been given me to do.

"I have done mission work for many years. I have been connected with the Bowery Mission, and I consider that I am still in service."

"You write hymns yet, of course?"

"Yes, occasionally."

"Perhaps you will write some verses for your friends on your birthday."

The idea seemed to please her. "Perhaps," she said, "perhaps."

"What message do you want to send to your friends all over the world through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD? Will you tell them that life is worth living?"

"Indeed, yes," she said earnestly, "indeed it is. Say to them never to cross a bridge until they come to it—never to be discouraged; never to look for evil, but to have faith and hope—and love!"

With her bright "good-by" still ringing in my ears I closed the door and went away, and as I went, I wished that all who were weary and heavy laden, and who felt that the burden of life was unendurable, could come, even for a few moments, within the radius of the atmosphere of that loving, cheerful soul, Fanny Crosby, the grand old hymnologist, whom the whole Christian world loves and honors, and whose sweet songs of salvation and cheer are to-day sung in every land where the name of Jesus is known.

EUPHEMIA HOLDEN.

WOES OF THE WINE-DRINKER

License Cuts the Only Sure Restraint

WHO hath contentions? First of all, the drinker has inward "contentions" in conscience, such as are described in Rom. 7: 19. He is forever warring against God and against his nobler self. No soul can rest that is not right. Nothing causes deeper "woe" and "sorrow" than such self-reproach. It is also in the nature of alcohol to prompt the drinker to foolish quarrels with others. A fire without fuel would be hardly more unusual than a fight without drink. The Chicago Tribune, in an argument for high license, said: "The saloon business adds more than any other to the work of the police." That ought to be sufficient reason for prohibiting it, as other crimes that require the attention of the police are prohibited, many of them but children of what Senator Lot M. Merrill called "the crime of crimes."

An Unrestrained Tongue

Who hath babblings? "Wine in is wit out." He puts "an enemy in his mouth to steal away his brains." The talk one hears in a saloon is indeed "babbling," such as the revelation of family secrets to strangers, with effusive expressions of love to boon companions. The Revised Bible translates "complaining" instead of "babblings." The drinker has much of both. Much of the anarchistic discontent comes from those who have wasted their substance in riotous living. "Where is your carriage?" said the anarchistic demagogue from his dry goods box street pulpit, to his audience of tramps and loafers. "The rum-seller's got mine," said one of his half-drunken auditors. And there is no little "complaining" about the lost job, the better condition of those who are not supporting saloon-keepers, and about the mothers and wives who object to the debauching of husbands and sons. Worse than these, and yet more common, is the horrible cursing and filthy stories. "The whole head is sick," brain and tongue alike. Surely that is not the way to have "a good time"!

Who hath wounds without cause? When Theodore Roosevelt was Police Commissioner of New York, he set the police to close the Sunday saloons, thereby reducing the number of patients in the hospitals, a striking reminder of the fact that many wounds are due to drink as well as many diseases. If we would close the saloons, we might, no doubt, turn half our hospitals into schools, of which many cities have too few, because taxes are so largely used up on the consequences of drink.

There is a crippled boy. What made him so? A drunken nurse dropped him in babyhood. There is a man with one leg gone; you will embarrass him if you ask him if he lost it fighting for his country; for it was amputated by a street car when he was too drunk to get out of the way. There is a wife and mother with one eye gone: it was gouged out in drunken fury by the man who had promised to love and cherish her. Bottles have made more wounds than bullets, and the scars of the former are not badges of honor but of shame. Surely these "wounds" mean "woe," not joy! One of the most terrible of the destroyers now used in war is the self-propelling torpedo, which is launched as a submarine boat, and goes swiftly beneath the water to an enemy's ship lying far away, to blow it suddenly into the air with all on board. The bottle is such a torpedo, shot from the brewery or the distillery, to destroy the prosperity and happiness of the home. As the ancient Slavs buried some human being alive as a sacrifice under the corner-stone of every important building, so every saloon lays its foundation in the blood of broken-hearted mothers and children and ruined young men.

Weakens and Disfigures

Who hath redness of eyes? Alcohol assails every part of the body, but the red flag of danger is most distinctly seen in the face. A recent test of Swiss soldiers in marksmanship showed that total abstainers are the best shots. Drink mars the eye for work as well as for beauty. And it is drink that creates more than anything else, the "just of the eyes." "Redness of eyes," which also implies dimness of vision, reminds us how every bodily function is disar-

ranged by drink, as if one poured a muddy stream into a watch. The heart, whipped by alcohol into unnatural activity throws the blood too rapidly into the little blood vessels of the eye and face, indeed, of the whole body, which for the moment increases surface heat, to be followed by unnatural cooling, as when coffee or tea has been poured into a saucer. The next effect is to stupefy the nerves, as when one takes ether, so that one does not feel either heat or cold, and so seems to be warmer in winter and cooler in summer, because less sensitive to his surroundings; but he is all the more in danger of freezing or sunstroke.

Wasting Precious Time

They that tarry long at the wine. What a vast waste of time is due to drink! "Time is money," in a very literal sense; and enough time is wasted in drinking, and the loafing and sickness that goes with it, to change poverty to plenty in the drunkard's home. From the beginning it has been the tendency of drink to create the craving for more. When one has eaten abundantly he wants no more till another meal-time, but every dose of intoxicants increases desire. When there is add, with attraction of social companions in a pleasant, in the music and amusements, it is easy to "tarry" which "saloon," the loafing, treating, plotting, found in its worst intensifies all the evils of drink, and form in the very countries that profess to be the best. In abject slavery to a foolish custom, that man who does not wish to drink, or would stop at one glass, drinks four or five rounds, in order that every member of the party may have his turn at treating. Besides the waste of money, what waste of precious time, what loss of work, there is in this long and worse than useless tarrying over the wine, or beer, or whisky! Enough wasted opportunity to make the tippler both rich and wise, he uses to make himself both poor and foolish.

"As he that lieth upon the top of a mast"

Temptations Removed

Look not upon the wine when it is red (that is, fermented) —when it shows its bead on the cup, when it flows in beauty from the flagon to the cup, and from the cup to the throat. This is one great advantage of prohibition. Even if old toppers can find the drink in hidden places, it is not arranged attractively in show windows before the gaze of boys and young men; and in "no-license" places, law-abiding people are less likely to put intoxicants on their tables. In the front store window of a dealer in wines and other intoxicating drinks, I several times noticed during the past winter placards displayed, upon which were lettered the words: "Come in and look, you will not be expected to buy." How like in sentiment and accordant in rhyme, I thought, to the familiar ditty of my childhood: "Will you walk into my parlor? said the spider to the fly." Little Henry had been very sick. When he was slowly getting better, and was just able to be up and about the room, he was left alone a short time. His sister came in eating a piece of cake. Henry's mamma had told him that he must eat nothing but what she gave him, because it would not be safe for him to have what other children did till he was stronger. He was hungry; the cake did look so good; he wanted very much to take a bite of it, and the kind sister would gladly have given it to him. "Jennie," said he, "you must run right out of the room away from me with that cake, and I will keep my eyes shut while you go, so that I shan't want it." It is half the battle to keep our eyes from lingering on the things that would harm us.

Nansen's Testimony

Here we see one of the chief benefits of prohibition. Where liquor-selling is forbidden, it cannot be set in windows to tempt the passer-by. To say that prohibition does not lessen sales, would be to say that business men do not know their business when they set their goods attractively in costly show windows, and it would also imply that laws enabling men to collect legal debts are useless. The outlawed saloon has no rights in the courts.

When it sparkleth in the cup. Here we have the same thought that Solomon put in another passage: "Wine is a mocker." It looks like a joy-bringer, a health and strength giver. For ages it fooled men with its claim that men could drink "health," and the idea that it gave strength was embodied in the misleading name "strong drink." No intelligent people now believe the use of intoxicants as a beverage makes a man stronger and healthier. Some still think the same drink cools them in summer and warms them in winter, when it only dulls their senses, like chloroform, so that they would not know when they are in peril of heat or cold. The Arctic traveler, Nansen, was guest at a dinner of medical and other scientists, held at Munich. A neighbor asked: "Did you take any alcohol with you when you left the Fram to make your heroic expedition by sledges?" "No," said Nansen, "for if I had done so, I should never have returned." And yet so-called statesmen in Washington argue that liquors must be sold in Alaska because it is so cold, and in the Philippines because it is so warm.

A patient was arguing with the doctor on the necessity of his taking a stimulant. Said he: "But, doctor, I must have some kind of stimulant. I am cold, and it warms me." "Precisely," came the doctor's crusty answer. "See here. This stick is cold," taking up a stick of wood from the box beside the hearth and tossing it into the fire. "Now it is warm, but is the stick benefited?" The sick man watched the wood first send out little puffs of smoke, and then burst into a flame, and replied: "Of course not. It is burning itself." And so are you, when you are warming yourself with alcohol; you are literally burning up the delicate tissues of your stomach and brain.

False Promises of Joy

"Wine is a mocker" also when it claims to be a stimulant. Its first effect is to stimulate. Its final work is depressant when nature pays the forced loan of stimulation. Beer is also a mocker, especially when it claims to be a harmless drink. The papers are full of the stories of the people who have been tricked, but no man has been more fooled and defrauded than he who has taken intoxicants for health, or strength, or joy. What a mocker is the alcohol in patent medicines, that makes people toppers in the guise of medicine.

At last it biteth like a serpent (this is a general term), and stingeth like an adder (an exceedingly venomous horned snake). A young man, some years ago, while in the jungle in Africa with an exploring party, caught a young boa constrictor, which, for amusement, he taught some wonderful tricks, one of which was to coil itself about his feet and body, and as it reached above his head, to curve over and kiss his face, and then, at a signal, drop to the ground. The scene was an African jungle. A traveler on the stage, followed by a stealthily moving object, the head of a great snake, with eyes like fire. It crept softly to the man, wound itself about him, and brought its head in line with his face. He gave the signal, but the serpent was affected by the fumes of his breath; it had him entirely in its power, and tightening its coil about his body, crushed out his life. How many tragedies of young lives crushed out by the serpent of drink there are!

"It biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder"

powerless to control. As is always the case, Howard himself was the last to realize his danger, believing that his mother and sister were over-anxious, and that he "could stop when he chose."

His sleep on the train was short. As he waked, the monotonous sound of the wheels beat upon his brain and mechanically he began counting "one, two, three, four, one, two, three, four." Then half-consciously he substituted for the numbers the old ditty of childhood:

Rich man, poor man, beggar man, thief,
Doctor, lawyer, merchant, chief.

With a start, he roused to full consciousness, a paraphrase of the familiar words ringing in his ears:

Drunkard, liar, murderer, thief,
Coward, rascal, fugitive.

He tried to forget them, but the rhythmic pounding of the wheels beat the cruel words into his brain till at times it seemed as if he must jump from the train. He sat outwardly calm; but as he thought of his dead friend and the two sorrowing families, he felt that he should go mad.

"Our poor mothers! Our poor sisters!" he almost wailed. "Curse the liquor! I'll fight it to my latest breath. Howard Graham is dead, but Seth Small shall work."

Then he remembered that he was a fugitive and must walk warily, seeing ever a noose hanging over his head. But his vow was a new strength and inspiration. Resolutely he put his past behind him, and turned his attention to the wonderland of oil, coal and iron through which they were passing. He had never traveled and, in spite of the ditty of the wheels, he was soon measurably diverted and interested and began to plan his future. Tuesday evening he reached Chicago, and finding that he made close connection with the Burlington train for the coast, decided to go on further west.

At Omaha, next afternoon, a big, good-natured man came into the car and took the seat beside him. He was a cattle man familiar with the country and its resources, an entertaining companion for one entering on life in a new region. Howard told him truly that he had been ill; his physician had advised change of climate, and he had come west with no definite plans. He was a surveyor, but would be glad of any respectable work.

His new acquaintance, Mr. Brown, had come west more than a quarter of a century before, a heart-sick invalid, to find among the mountains health and wealth. He was noted for his kindness to the "tenderfeet" and the keen judgment with which he selected the worthy. His business gave him the opportunity of employing and testing many. His wife had laughingly called their ranch "a clearing-house for eastern runaways," so many young men were there who were ultimately persuaded to return home or helped to positions. It was a practical and modest sort of home mission work in which the good couple delighted. The good wife never guessed the shady spot in her husband's history, nor could she divine the bitter memories which had made him so kind to others, and so wise.

Next day's ride was through the Black Hills and the scenes of the Custer-Indian raids. To Mr. Brown it was familiar ground. Listening to his story of those wild days, Howard almost forgot his own plight, and did not notice the keenness with which he was being studied. The older man read the signs of strength and weakness in his face, and noted the marks of dissipation and sorrow.

"There is a sad story here," he thought. "He has been sick, no doubt, but that is not all. He's worth trying for. I'll take him to mother," as in rural fashion he called his wife.

"Well, young man," he said late in the afternoon. "What did you say your name was? Seth! Good honest name; no humbug about it! It's honest and square-sounding." Howard winced. "Well, Seth, as you have no special plans, go home with me. I have a little place up here in the spurs of the Rockies, a matter of a few thousand acres. We'll find something for you to do there till you get your bearings. The missus will make you right welcome."

There was no doubting the hearty kindness of the invitation, and it was gratefully accepted. Thus was answered the mother's heart-broken cry, "O God, take care of my boy." The big-hearted ranchman, in the coarse gray suit, was as surely God's messenger as any angel of olden times.

The next morning they left the train and were met at the station by a big farm wagon and three extra horses—one for Mr. Brown to ride and two to "spell" those in harness, and make a four-horse-team when necessary. An extra saddle had been brought, so a mount was easily arranged for Howard. Among the goods loaded on the wagon was a lot of fence-wire and Mr. Brown said:

"I think, Seth, your first work will be to help put this up," and Howard answered with a cheery

"All right, sir."

Work in the Philippines

HOPEFUL reports come from all sources of the progress of missions in our far-off possessions. The American Board, taking a general survey, says: "Missionary work is keeping pace with the other forces of development in the islands. The success of Bishop Brent, of the Protestant Episcopal Church, in establishing missions is noteworthy. Presbyterians have eight vigorous stations. The work is radiating from the centres over a wide area—as from Iloilo, which station reports that a people back in the mountains who, since the revolution, have been living in the fields, the companions or the prey of the mountain robber bands, have formed a village, and organized in it a church whence the Gospel message is spreading to other villages in the mountains. In this one mission station some six hundred adults have been baptized during the year, and the outlook is bright for all forms of work, educational and medical as well as evangelistic."

"Bishop Oldham, of the Methodist Church, declares that he finds no such opportunity in any foreign mission field to win the thousands of the natural leaders of the people as is now before his church in Luzon. The outlook is bright; everywhere there is a welcome and a response to the Protestant message." It is encouraging to learn that the American Board is sending out a duly qualified physician, Dr. Charles T. Sibley, and his wife, who is a trained nurse. Their assistance will give new energy to the work there and will be valuable to the missionaries as well as to the natives.

Scatter Flowers Among the Living

SCATTER flowers among the living,
Do not save all for the dead;
They no longer need their fragrance,
Resting in their narrow bed;
They are with the blessed angels,
Where the flowers never fade;
Clothed in garments pure and spotless,
In the mansions God hath made.

Some are bent with heavy burdens,
As they journey on life's road;
May we not strew sweetest blossoms
If we carry half their load?
Then the God who watches o'er us,
He who knoweth every thought,
He will send us many blessings,
With the sweetest fragrance fraught.

May the sunshine on our faces
Shine upon some face that's sad!
It may help to banish sorrow,
It may help to make them glad.
Give to them the choicest blossoms,
Some of kindness, some of love;
Help them feel there's hope remaining,
Point them to the home above.

School Children in a Fire-Trap

A GAIN the American people have been thrilled with horror by a fire in which many innocent lives were lost, and narrow, ill-arranged entrances and inadequate precautions played their part in adding to the long death list of at least one hundred and seventy, all pupils and teachers in the Collinwood School, at Collinwood, not far from Cleveland, Ohio.

There are conflicting reports as to the causes of the disaster, and the matter will probably not be settled until the coroner makes his investigation and report. At present the most probable theory seems to be that the fire started from an overheated furnace in the basement.

It was half-past nine in the morning,

it was but the signal for the fire-drill which was gone through frequently. She formed her line and led them out into the hall. There the children saw the flames, and, with a shriek, broke ranks and plunged madly forward, knocking one another down and forming a barrier against the back door they sought to open.

More of the children on the upper floors were saved than those who went out of their rooms below. One of the teachers on the top floor started her classes down stairs, but she quickly saw that there was no hope of getting them out through the panic below. She led them into a room from which another class had marched but a moment before.
Opening the window onto the one fire-

The Collinwood Schoolhouse Where Over 170 Children Perished and the pupils were at their recitations upstairs, when the janitor noticed a little thread of smoke rising from under the front stairway. He at once ran to the fire-alarm and rang the gong vigorously.

At once the recitations stopped, and the teachers without excitement formed their classes for marching out as they had so often done in the school fire drill. There were nine rooms in the building and about three hundred pupils registered as regular attendants. The building, the reports from Collinwood state, was much overcrowded, and the younger pupils of from six to seven years of age were in what were called the attic rooms.

For the first few moments things went well, but as soon as the lower classes had got down toward the front door, and the children saw that it was a real fire, and that the flames were already licking hungrily at the woodwork of the hall, all discipline was at once thrown to the winds, and despite the heroic efforts of the teachers, a wild panic ensued.

They broke ranks and dashed in a wild crowd down the lower hall and up against the main doors. These doors were the main cause of such a fearful loss of life. Like so many others in private and public buildings, they were made to open inward. The first comers were jammed hard against the doors by those behind, holding the doors tightly shut.
Despite the struggling mass in front other pupils rushed madly on from behind, trampling over their fallen comrades, to be thrown down in turn by those who followed from other classrooms. The pupils perished where they fell.

Many of the pupils, convinced that they could not escape by the front entrance, rushed down to the rear door. It is not definitely known whether the door was locked, but at any rate, pull as they might, the door would not open. Miss Catherine Weiler, one of the teachers, lost her life while trying to marshal her pupils. She was killed in the crush at the rear door and her body was found an hour later beneath those of a number of her class. Her room was on the second floor. Hearing the fire alarm, she thought escape she passed her pupils rapidly out.

A few broke away and ran to the stairs, only to be burned to death.

Then the news spread rapidly and frantic parents and eager volunteers rushed to the scene, but the structure was doomed and they could do little. The front door was partly battered in and partly burned away enough to show the heap of children massed against it.
Eager hands grasped the children, but they were so tightly wedged that no human strength could pull out even one.

The flames spread with such rapidity that within one-half hour after the first smoke was seen, there was nothing left but blackened walls, with gaping windows, and a cellar filled with burning beams and charred bodies. One of the ear shops was later turned into a temporary morgue, through which passed a long and sorrowful procession of parents, all looking for what they hoped, yet feared to find.

MUSIC STUDENTS

Should Have Steady Nerves.

The nervous system of the musician is of very sensitive and any habit like coffee dri-ing may so upset the nerves as to make relar and necessary daily practise next to possible.

"I practise from seven to eight hours a and study Harmony two hours," write Michigan music student. "Last Septemb-was so nervous I could only practise a minutes at a time and mother said I wo have to drop my music for a year.

"This was terribly discouraging, as I co-not bear the thought of losing a whole y of study. Becoming convinced that my vousness was caused largely by coffee, a seeing Postum so highly spoken of, I decid-
I would test it for a while.

"Mother followed the directions carefuand I thought I had never tasted such a d-cious drink. We drank Postum every mo-ing instead of coffee, and by November I more like myself than for years, and v-

A COURSE IN ESPERANTO

LESSON No. 6. By Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

Is it your daily habit to give aloud the sounds of the letters in the Esperanto alphabet?

As to accent: Do you always accent the syllable next to the last? In words of two syllables the accent would of course be on the first syllable. Accent strongly. It is the beauty of Esperanto.

Do you study aloud? Do you write out all exercises? Do you try to think in Esperanto?

Learn to speak by speaking.

Esperanto Note

Mrs. S. E. B. South Scituate. "One letter, one sound" is the invariable rule in Esperanto. An error was made in the reply to you in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of February 19. It is the principle laid down in the Fundamento de Esperanto, by Dr. Zamenhof, the founder of Esperanto, to which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will loyally hold.

Books Received

Rejoice Always, or Happiness is for You, by Frank S. Van Eps and Marion B. Van Eps. A book on the practical value to one's health, happiness and well-being of "joy in the Lord." The authors explain how living in conscious oneness with God influences the whole life, inducing cheerfulness and enabling us to overcome trouble and transform disaster into blessing. "Putting on joy as a garment" and keeping in touch with God is declared to be the real secret of personal force. The book is full of spiritual suggestion, but is in no sense identical with Christian Science. Pp. 186. Cloth binding. Price $1. APPENDICITIS

Grape-Nuts as a Reconstructing Food.

The number of cases of appendicitis which get well by proper feeding and nursing is not less remarkable than the number of cases which were formerly operated on only to find that the operation was unnecessary.

While looking for the cause of this disease, it is well to remember that excessive starch fermentation may be considered a frequent cause, and that suggests more care in the use of starchy foods.

Grape-Nuts can be retained on the most sensitive stomach and is extremely nourishing—just the ideal food for appendicitis cases.

"Last spring I was taken ill with appendicitis," writes an Indiana man. "The doctor told me not to be alarmed, for he would do the best he could to save me from the operating table.

"He advised me to eat nothing for two weeks, during which time I became so weak I could hardly move. The trouble began to leave me and I began to eat fruits and milk, but I did not regain the strength I had before I was sick.

"A friend of mine recommended Grape-Nuts. I tried it and it worked wonders with me. I soon began to gain in strength, and in a month was as strong as ever.

"I don't think I ever used a food that did me so much good. I now weigh 160 pounds, as against 130 before I was sick, all due to Grape-Nuts and regular exercise.

"My muscles are like iron and I can do the hardest work. Being employed in a printing office, I have to think a lot, and my mind is clear, thanks to Grape-Nuts." "There's a Reason." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Chief Shippy's Escape

An Anarchist's Startling Attempt in Chicago

FROM East to West there seems to be an epidemic of crime sweeping over the country, murders and holdups being reported in increasing numbers in our daily papers. The police of our great cities have been almost powerless so far to stop this epidemic, partly, it is said, because this country has no secret service that can ferret out plots against the public peace before open attacks are made. Organized gangs of evil-doers are making war on the respectable and law-abiding portions of the community, and from attacking private citizens they have begun to threaten the municipal authorities. Clergymen, as advocates of order, have also been made objects of assaults.

Chief of Police George M. Shippy, of Chicago, was recently attacked by a desperado, and in the encounter the chief, his son and his coachman were wounded, and the assassin shot dead.

Chief Shippy has had a long career on the police force of Chicago, and is known as a brave man who more than once has taken his life in his hands while enforcing the law. The chief was preparing in the morning to leave his home for headquarters, and his buggy was already standing before the door with his driver, Foley, on the seat. A dark, foreign-looking man sauntered up to the door and pulled the bell sharply. The chief was near the hall and answered the ring himself.

The stranger thrust an envelope into the chief's hand, saying: "Here is a note I bring you."

A sudden move on the stranger's part at once made the chief suspicious, and he caught hold of both his hands and called for Mrs. Shippy to search the man's pockets. The man jerked back, but Mrs. Shippy had just time to discover a revolver in his pocket.

"He's got one!" she cried, "look out, George, for your life."

The chief whipped out his own revolver and aimed it at the desperado. The latter, wild with rage, attempted to shoot Mrs. Shippy as she dodged back from him. Georgia, the chief's daughter, and Foley, the coachman, rushed up to discover the cause of the commotion, while the chief's son, Harry, came dashing down stairs with a pistol in his hand. The assassin lunged with a large knife at the chief as he was about to fire and gashed his arm pit, shot Foley through the wrist, and, turning back, sent a bullet through the lungs of young Shippy as he was about to close. Chief Shippy and Foley fired together and sent seven bullets into the body of the assassin, who dropped dead on the porch.

It was found that the desperado came a short time ago from Russia, and his name was supposed to be Lazarus A. Aberbuch. It is said that the man was selected by lot to do the deed at a meeting arranged to form plans to make away with the chief of police and Mayor Busse.

Are You Too Thin?

For only 15 minutes a day's practice in your own room upon special exercises that I will give, you can be round, plump, wholesome, rested and attractive. Nature intended you to be—why should you not?

A pupil who was thin writes me:

"I just can't tell you how happy I am! I wore low neck and short sleeves the other night and I was so proud of my neck and arms! My busts are rounded out and I have gained 28 lbs. It has come just where I wanted it and I carry myself like another woman. My old dresses look stylish on me now. You remember I have not been constipated since my second lesson and I had taken something for years. I guess my stomach must be stronger too, for I sleep like a baby and my nerves are so rested. I feel as if I had missed so much enjoyment in life, for I never did have such good times before. I feel so well all the time."

I have built up thousands of women—why not you? You will be so much better satisfied with yourself and more attractive to your friends. I will cheerfully tell you about my work, and if I cannot help your particular case I will tell you so. My information and advice are entirely free.

Deliverance From Sin

By Mrs. M. Baxter

EVERYONE has woe and sorrow from time to time; but as Solomon declares they are the lot of the drunkard always. "The drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty" (Prov. 23: 21). "Who hath contentions?" Many a one who has not learned the secret of taking all things from the hand of God; but the poor drunkard is never free from them. He contends with his wife, he contends with his children, he contends with his neighbors. "Who hath complaining?" Who is it that makes his home miserable, brings no money home to buy food, and then complains because there is none? Who but the drunkard? "Who hath wounds without cause?" Is it not the man who, no longer master of himself, rolls down into the gutter and breaks his arm or wounds his head against the curbstone? or a man who picks a senseless quarrel with another drunkard, and gets a broken head without cause? It is a terrible picture of the degradation, the perversion, of a being created to be "the image and glory of God."

The finishing touches, the vivid description of a man in delirium tremens—the eye seeing strange women, the heart uttering perverse things, the awful sensation of lying on the top of a mast or in the midst of the sea, of being stricken and feeling nothing; the awful sense of being the helpless prey of unseen foes; how unspeakable the misery depicted! How often have we been ready to wish that all the intoxicating drinks, which are the means of such a degradation of man, were down at the bottom of the sea! And heartily we desire that all the efforts of temperance reformers may be owned and blessed of God. But while the heart of man is away from God, he cannot but be a prey to the enemy of souls; he cannot but be a slave to sin, in one form or another. "Know ye not that to whom ye present yourselves as bond-servants, [R.V., marg.] unto obedience, his bond-servants ye are whom ye obey, whether of sin unto death or of obedience unto righteousness?" (Rom. 6: 16.) The root of the drunkard's sin and misery is not so much the amount of temptation, terrible as it is, which surrounds him, but the lack of that relation to God which would bind him in heart and will to him who has the will and power to keep him from evil.

If a man whose nature tends to self-indulgence, whose environment and associations lead to indulge in that which procures him temporary gratification, and enables him for a time to forget things which he would rather forget—if such a man has no power other than his own already-enslaved will to fight against his sin, he is indeed to be pitied. And such is the case with almost all the slaves to spirituous liquors, to opium in all its forms, to tobacco, or any other thing by which the body is brought into an unnatural condition, neither responding to God, nor yet to the power of self-government.

The way out of bondage is to turn our will, as far as we are masters of it, towards the only hope for Satan's slave—the re-establishment of our primary relation to God. How can a lost man or woman, a bondslave to drink, opium, smoking, impurity, speculation, frivolity, or any of Satan's chains, break through his prisonhouse and be free? Let the slave of sin go to the best source of information, the Word of God, and read for himself whether God is to be trusted. Let him seek some word which will show him whether God hates him because of his sin, or whether God loves him while he hates his sin. "God so loved the world," with all the drunkards in it, "that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever [even the most enslaved drunkard] believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

Is it true, and is it true for me? Can God love me, who hate myself? If this is true, then there is hope for me. If this is true, God does not want me to perish. If this is true, then God is on my side, and my side is stronger than that of the devil and all his angels.

I Am the Paint Man 2 Full Gallons Free to Try—3 Months Time to Pay

You Pay No Freight To Try My Paint

I AM The Paint Man. I have a new way of manufacturing and selling House Paint.

It's unique—it's better. Before my plan was invented, Paint was sold in two ways—either "Ready Made"—or Paint Ingredients were bought and mixed together by a Painter. Both of these ways are at fault.

"Ready Made" Paint settles on dealers' shelves—sediment forms in the bottom of the can—the mineral pigments and chemically acting driers in "Ready Made" Paint eat the life out of the Linseed Oil—and Linseed Oil is the LIFE of ALL PAINT. Paint cannot be properly made by a painter, because of the lack of heavy mixing and grinding machinery.

My Paint is unlike any other Paint in the world. It's ready to use—but not "Ready Made."

My Paint is made to order—after the order is received. It is packed in hermetically sealed cans—and the date it is made is stamped on each can by Factory Inspector.

Only PURE Linseed Oil and Pure FRESH Paint Ingredients are used in my Paint. Paint Ingredients and Linseed Oil found at local dealers' is oftentimes adulterated.

I sell my Paint direct from Factory to User—at very low factory prices.

You pay no dealer's or middleman's profits. I pay the freight on Six Gallon Orders or over. My paint is so good that I make this wonderful fair test offer: When you receive a shipment of 6 gallons—or over—of my Paint, you can use two full gallons to test it.

If—after you have used the Paint—you are not perfectly satisfied with it in every particular—RETURN THE BALANCE OF THE PAINT TO ME—and the two gallons you have used won't cost you one penny.

No OTHER paint manufacturer ever made such a liberal offer. It's because my Paint is the finest Paint made—put up in the best way—that I can make such an offer as this. I go even further—I sell my Paint to responsible parties ON THREE MONTHS' TIME if desired.

I make three brands of Paint to suit the requirements of my immense trade.

My Strictly Pure All White Lead Paint is absolutely the best high-grade Paint in the world.

My 40-60 Brand—Zinc and Lead Paint—is the best paint, in its class, on the market.

My Durability Paint has an immense sale everywhere and gives splendid satisfaction. This Paint is guaranteed for five years under an ironclad guarantee.

The Purity of all my Paints is guaranteed under a forfeit of $100.00 IN GOLD.

All of my Paints are packed in Extra Size Gallon Cans—guaranteed to turn out a full gallon measure of Paint—my customers' insurance of full measure.

For further particulars about my Made-to-order Paint and my Plan of Selling, send for my Paint Book—the most complete book of its kind ever published. It gives full descriptions of my celebrated Paints—and complete set of large Color Cards to select from—the biggest Color Cards ever put into a Paint Book.

MORSE BROS., Props. Canton, Mass., U.S.A.

"Neighbors, Give Your Boys and Girls a Chance!"

used these words in closing his address to his old friends and neighbors just before starting for Washington to assume the duties of President of the United States. He knew the value of an education, and that the best education is acquired by reading good books. He had walked many miles to borrow a book, and knew that the boy or girl who is started in life with the habit of reading good, wholesome books, has a great advantage over the boy or girl who reads dime novels or cheap, trashy literature, or who does not read at all.

Fathers, qualify your boys and girls for the great battle of life. The day must come in the course of events when their chairs will be empty by your fireside, and they will be out struggling alone in the world. Equip them now for this struggle. It will repay you a thousandfold.

Mothers, you know, as all the world knows, that the success in life of your boys and girls is heaven to you. There is little else in the world worth living for. "Give your boys and girls a chance." Give them an education which will fit them for the stern realities of life. Teach them to love home by making the home so attractive that it is worth loving. Place in your home, good, interesting, truthful books for your children. In this day and age of fierce competition it is little short of a misfortune for any boy or girl to grow up without the equipment of a good education, and especially a knowledge of History. In the words of Lincoln, "Give Your Boys and Girls a Chance."

No other work of its kind has ever supplied a History so well suited to the needs of all classes and conditions of men. We mark the marvelous influence of Christianity upon the world's progress. He would be a blind reader of history indeed who did not discern, throughout all, the influence of a great Omnipotent hand, guiding and developing all things. We cheerfully commend this most popular and complete of all world histories to our readers. These nine handsomely bound volumes will make the very best nucleus for a family library, and will be a potent educator of the young and a mine of valuable information for readers of all ages.

PRESIDENT WM. MCKINLEY said:

"I am familiar with the merits of Ridpath's History of the World, and cordially commend it to the scholar as well as to the plain people generally."

PROF. WARREN, Pres't Boston University, said:

"I should be glad to see it placed in the library of every young person in the United States, and even in the English-speaking world. In families where there are bright children it will render excellent service to the cause of popular intelligence."

PROF. LONG, Supt. Public Schools, St. Louis, said:

"I unhesitatingly commend Dr. Ridpath's History of the World as the ablest work on that subject which I have ever examined. The engravings, maps and charts are alone worth the entire cost of the set."

BISHOP VINCENT, Chancellor of Chautauqua, said:

"Ridpath's History is in clear and agreeable style, comprehensive in treatment, readable type and admirable illustrations. This set of books is a permanent college chair of general history in one's own house."

THE BOSTON POST said:

"John Clark Ridpath is above all things an historian. His historical works are accepted as standards in schools and colleges, as well as in business houses and homes. His style is simple, his manner charming."

for Dr. Ridpath's enviable position as an historian is his wonderfully beautiful style, a style no other historian in any generation has ever equaled. He pictures the great historical events as though they were happening before your eyes; he carries you with him to see the battles of old; to meet kings and queens and warriors; to sit in the Roman senate; to march against Saladin and his dark-skinned followers; to sail the southern seas with Drake; to circumnavigate the globe with Magellan; to watch that thin line of Greek spearmen work havoc with the Persian hordes on the field of Marathon; to know Napoleon as you know Roosevelt. He combines absorbing interest with supreme reliability and makes the heroes of history real living men and women, and about them he weaves the rise and fall of empires in such a fascinating style that history becomes as absorbingly interesting as the greatest of novels. Hundreds who read this have decided to buy Ridpath some day; now is the time. No need for us to tell you about Ridpath. The English-speaking world has pronounced this the only history of the world worth having.

It is to-day in 200,000 American homes and is endorsed by Public Men, Educators, Business Men, the Clergy and everybody who knows history.

Why You Ought to Buy Ridpath's History Now

Because it is the only general history recognized everywhere as authority.
Because it is complete. It begins with the oldest civilization and gives the complete history of every country and every race; in fact, the history of mankind, including all achievements in war, discovery, invention, art, science, religion, philosophy and government.

Because it is the most beautifully illustrated of any historical work ever issued. It contains more than 2,000 illustrations. A famous educator has said that he considers the illustrations alone worth the entire cost of the set.

Because it will not only interest and instruct the average man or woman, but it will delight the children. It is so beautifully written that children will learn to love history reading. It will start them along the line of reading good things, of becoming interested in that which is true instead of reading novels and trashy literature.

Because the new ninth volume tells the story of recent—we might almost say current events. It gives the complete history of the Boer War, the Spanish-American War, and the more recent Russia-Japan War. It brings the history of every nation right down to date.

Because Ridpath's History of the World is absolutely accurate and thoroughly reliable. Dr. Ridpath spent the span of an ordinary lifetime in writing the work.

Because this is your chance to buy it at a nominal price—much less than the work has ever been offered before or ever will be offered again—and you may pay in small sums monthly if you prefer.

Questions and Answers

H. E. B. Marathon, N. Y. What is the largest ship-building city on the great lakes?

Most of the ports of the great lakes, especially those on Lake Erie, do some ship-building. Cleveland, O., is the leading ship-building port, according to one report. We are unable to answer the second question you sent.

S. S. Wellsville, N. Y. Who invented the telephone? Was it Mr. Bell or Mr. Edison?

The telephone was invented by Alexander Graham Bell, who was born in Edinburgh, Scotland, in 1847. He came to the United States in 1872. You should have sent your full name and not initials.

Reader (M. A.), Minnesota, and another. What is the value of a violin with Antonius Stradivarius Cremonensis faciebat Anno 1716, written on the inside? Will you please tell how we can tell if it is genuine?

If it should prove to be a genuine Stradivarius of the "Grand" period, it might be very valuable. Some Cremona violins, which were originally sold by the makers for about $20 apiece, have brought in late years thousands of dollars. We would advise you to write to A. Gemunder & Sons, 42 East Twenty-third Street, N. Y.

J. J. H., Chester, Conn. 1. When and by whom were the first colored men brought to this country as slaves? 2. From what part of Africa were these taken, and was any objection made by this country to prevent them from being brought here? 3. Were they bought and sold on their arrival here?

1. In the year 1619 a Dutch ship arrived at Jamestown, Va., with a cargo of negro slaves. 2. It is not known from what part they came. There was no objection to their being brought here, as at that time in the colony white men were held in bondage. The only difference was that the whites served for a limited period, while the colored men were bound to a master for life. 3. Yes.

H. E. B. A., Bakersville, N. J. Where is the Golden Gate and the Golden Horn in Europe?

The Golden Gate is a channel two miles wide, forming the entrance to San Francisco Bay, California. The Golden Horn is the harbor of Constantinople, an inlet of the Bosphorus. It is so called from its shape and beauty. We are unable to answer your other questions. You should have sent name with the address.

S. I. T., Kalamazoo, Mich. What happened in September, 1869, on a Friday, giving it the name of Black Friday?

On September 24, 1869, a group of speculators advanced the price of gold suddenly to 162½, causing a panic that resulted in the failure of many business firms.

H. L., Thomasville, Ga. What are the six largest navies in the world in general order? 2. Where is the Army and Navy Magazine published?

1. The first six navies are those of Great Britain, United States, Germany, France, Japan, Russia. 2. New York.

S. S., Findlay, Ill. 1. Of what State is Vice-President Fairbanks a citizen? 2. How many soldiers, including officers, in the army of the United States? 3. How many post-offices in the United States? 4. What is a body politic?

1. Indiana. 2. The total number of officers is 3,896; enlisted men, 69,871. This does not include the native Philippine scouts, which number 5,000 men and 116 officers, and the Porto Rico regiment, 605 officers and men. The army with full ranks should consist of 100,000 men. 3. There are 6,318 presidential offices and 56,345 fourth class. 4. The body politic is the State or nation as an organized political body—the people as a whole. You can secure answers to your two other questions by writing to the clerk of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C. You should send your name in full in all letters to THE MAIL-BAG.

R. McL., Stirling, N. S. 1. Was the rich young ruler justified in saying that he had kept all the commandments from his youth? 2. Upon what grounds can the millions who die in heathenism be condemned to eternal punishment? 3. How is it that Matthew and Luke differ about Christ's genealogy? 4. Is capital punishment justifiable?

1. We cannot say. Perhaps some who knew him intimately might have disputed the fact. Perhaps he told the truth according to his own standard. We are inclined to think so from the statement that Jesus beholding him loved him. You must remember that the deeper spiritual meaning that Jesus gave to the commandments was not the standard the ruler applied or

This same remark applies to ordinary floating debt or current liabilities, which should be properly taken care of without interfering with the church's offerings to foreign missions.

W. H. Are diamonds found in the United States?

The statement is made in Nelson's Encyclopedia that "In the United States a great many diamonds have been found in the glacial drift south of the Great Lakes. The probable source of these gems has been a most interesting geological speculation."

A. O. B., Owanita, Fla. Are men the children of God before their conversion?

Not in the spiritual sense. In the moral sense, and by nature and kinship, we are his children. Disobedient, unworthy, vagrant, but his children, as the prodigal son was the son of his father when he was feeding swine in the far country. To the Greeks Paul said (Acts 17: 29), "Forasmuch as should. There is enough wealth in the world to provide food and clothing and shelter for all, but under our present system some get more than their share, and the others suffer and some starve. If a good man, though he be the seed of the righteous, acts imprudently, or is wasteful, or speculates unwisely, God does not interfere to keep him from ruin. 2. The kingdom of God is that condition in which God rules. It is not a place, but a state. If you ask God to govern your life and pledge yourself to obey him as a loyal subject, trusting in Christ to give you the necessary power, you are in the kingdom of God. So long as you cling to some sin you are unwilling to renounce, you are outside the kingdom.

"New Testament" Policemen

A REAL revival has sprung up in the Birmingham, England, Police Station, near the home of Mr. Charles M. Alexander, the Gospel singer, through the officers carrying and reading New Testaments. Eight of the policemen have confessed Christ and five have joined the Confirmation Class. The officers and hundreds of other people in Birmingham belong to the Pocket Testament League, which was originated by Mrs. Alexander. The photograph shows the members of the Police Bible Class.

was expected to apply. Paul said practically the same thing (Phil. 3: 6), though he called himself the chief of sinners. 2. If God does so condemn them, you may be sure he has good grounds. It is not for us to question his righteousness. Our duty consists in doing all in our power to send the Gospel to the heathen. Whatever God may do with them we may be certain he will do no injustice. 3. It is supposed that Luke traces the genealogy of Mary and that Luke 3: 23 should read, "who was the son-in-law of Heli." 4. Yes, it is justifiable, but we do not think it is wise. More murderers would be convicted and punished if the penalty was life-imprisonment.

Reader, Dorchester, New Brunswick. Is it right for the members of a local church, who have a financial debt upon the same, to contribute of their means to missionary or other foreign work until their own honest debts are paid?

If you mean that a church with a mortgage should not contribute to foreign mission work until the mortgage is paid, we cannot agree with you. The mortgage is taken care of by payment of the interest.

we are the offspring of God." Jeremiah, after upbraiding his people and calling them hard names, addresses them as God's children (Jer. 3: 22). There would be little hope of saving some men if there was not in them something of God to which appeal might be made. When they are restored to him by the new birth, then they are his spiritual children, greatly beloved for Christ's sake.

E. A. B., whose letter appeared recently in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, writes:

THE WAR CLOUD OVER CHINA

Japanese Minister of War

SIXTEEN years ago, when our people knew a great deal less about China and Japan than they do now, war broke out between these two nations, in which several bloody battles were fought, and Japan, with her modern drill, rifles, and heavy warships, was the victor. The provocation at that time was not large, and now, over a very small matter, which could be easily settled by a court of Admiralty, there is again a threat and growl of war in the East—that

East which we have long thought of as passive, but which now seems to be the scene of world events.

As long ago as February 7, a steamer belonging to a Japanese commercial company, and bearing the euphonious name of Tatsu Maru, sailed into the port of Macao, China. There was a strong suspicion in the minds of the Chinese officials, based probably on reports from secret agents received beforehand, that there were concealed on board the Tatsu a large supply of arms and ammunition which was intended for the revolutionists, who were then operating in several districts of South China and terrorizing the country. The Chinese ships, under the orders of Commander Kwangtung, surrounded the Tatsu and sent an armed party over her rails, much to the surprise of the placid Japanese merchant commander, who expected that the Japanese flag would inspire sufficient awe to keep even four Chinese gunboats at bay. The Chinese made a thorough investigation of the Tatsu's cargo, and evidently felt that they had found sufficient evidence to justify her detention, and then pulled down the Japanese colors and took the ship to Canton.

It added greatly to the snarl that Macao is a Portuguese concession, over which a Portuguese governor holds sway. The Japanese official report, printed recently in London, states that the ship was seized by force by Chinese warships, while she was lying at anchor and waiting for a turn of the tide at Macao. The steamer, they claim, was far enough in shore to be in Portuguese waters. The Chinese sailors, the report continues, fully armed, boarded the merchant ship, seized part of the crew, and took part of the cargo. Japan contends that the ship held a regular permit from the Portuguese authorities, to allow the Japanese to land the arms and ammunition openly. Japan sent a demand for the immediate release of the Tatsu, and also for an official apology and an indemnity to be paid the owners.

The Chinese were very unwilling to do this. They claimed that arms and munitions of war should not be carried to Chinese rebels in the hold of a ship flying the flag of a nation that is supposed to be friendly and with which they had been long at peace, and that this act of private owners should not be backed up by the Japanese Government. Ever since the ships of the Rising Sun crushed the fleet of the Dragon on the waters of the Yellow River—a day that still burns in the memory of the Chinese—the hand of Japan has been growing stronger and heavier in their affairs, and it has caused much uneasiness. The Chinese, their own leaders say, have conceded again and again until they can go no further and maintain the dignity of the empire. The recent interference with the Northern Railroad was a strong hint that Japan felt her influence to be dominant, and that all others must give way. Japan has made no secret of the fact that she wishes to be considered the leader of the East, even as far as India, as one of her foremost statesmen has put it.

In Canton a monster meeting was held that appealed to the growing patriotism of the Chinese masses and at which strong protests were made against the surrender of the steamship to Japan and against paying indemnity. Members of the Chinese aristocracy were wildly cheered when they declared that China should assert her sovereign rights. Resolutions were voted that if the cargo and the ship were not both confiscated for carrying arms to the insurgents, a boycott of all goods made and imported by the Japanese should at once be inaugurated.

After a short interval Japan sent an ultimatum that she would take immediate action to force a surrender of the ship if it were not at once given up.

At this writing there is a rumor that Japan will blockade Canton with a powerful fleet of ships. This may show why Japan has had so much interest in making much of the seizure of the merchantman. It would furnish her an excuse for sending a fleet about twelve hundred miles nearer the Philippines, and beyond the disturbed island of Formosa. It is not a long sail from Canton to Manila, and such a move would be watched with interest by all Americans if any critical unpleasantness should arise later between America and Japan over treaty questions.

China, being in no condition to go to war, will probably apologize and make terms with Japan to avoid a conflict. One report states that Great Britain may intervene in behalf of peace, and that the whole dispute will probably be settled in an admiralty court to be specially called for that purpose.

A Sermon by

GUEST AND HOST

TEXT—Rev. 3:20
"Behold, I stand at the door and knock."

IT is more than fifty years since the genius of a great painter stereotyped for the English-speaking world a misinterpretation of this text. Few modern pictures are better known than Holman Hunt's wonderful allegorical treatment of Christ as the Light of the World. Few have won a popularity so instantaneous; few have retained it so long. Reproductions of it are to be found in every city, almost in every home. There amid the shades of evening stands the kingly figure of the thorn-crowned One, knocking at the fast-shut door, at the door which has so long been closed that weeds rank and poisonous possess and bind it. Christ seeks entrance to the solitary human heart, saying, Behold, I stand at the door and knock!

For the door is hard to open,
And the weeds and ivy vine,
With their dark and clinging tendrils,
Ever round the hinges twine.

Sacred poetry has followed the devout imagination of the painter—in some cases has anticipated it. Joseph Grigg, Bishop How and Harriet Beecher Stowe bring us the same reading and the same appeal.

Ah! my soul, for such a wonder,
Wilt thou not undo the door?

It cannot be denied that there is exquisite beauty in that view. With the hymn-writer we can say,

O lovely attitude! He stands
With melting heart and laden hands;
and we can exclaim with him, at the marvel of it:
O matchless kindness! and he shows
This matchless kindness to his foes.

though such a comment, absolutely true to the letter and the spirit of other Scripture, is not true to this Scripture. It misinterprets the text and loses the whole point of the words addressed to the Laodicean Church, with their encouraging, inspiring message to us all.

The Church of Laodicea is the self-complacent church. It is so degenerate, so fallen, so lost to the whole purpose of the existence of a church, so alien from the mind of the Founder of the Church, that of it the Risen Christ is represented as speaking the one violent word of physical repugnance and loathing which to this day shocks and startles us. And the text says that at the door of this church, not at the single human soul, at the door of this church so unchurchlike, so un-Christian, Christ stands and knocks and asks admittance. And the promise of the text is that if in this recreant community any single individual will rise and let him in, then Christ will come into the midst of the company of unbelieving believers and unfaithful followers, will hold sweet communion with him who has responded to his call, will be first guest, then gracious host: "I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me!" Let a church be never so worldly, so cold, so barren of aspiration, so bankrupt of achievement, let its doors be never so fast-barred against sympathy, pity, love, its heart steeled against the pathos and the passion of the Cross, and still, if there be some in that church who will hear the Saviour's knock, and will rise and let him in, there into that worldly and selfish church which has a name to live and is dead, the Christ will come! And coming, he will fling fire on the earth!

The Individual Heart

It is not necessary to suggest that every church is a church of Laodiceans; it is not. But the argument is good from the inclusive to the particular; if the promise was made to a fallen and despicable church, that the individual in its midst who would hear Christ's knock and would open, should be able to let him in, how much more does it hold good where the church is not fallen, not despicable, and where the individual none the less will hear and heed the call of Christ! If he would come into the church of Laodicea, when one would open the door to him, how shall he not come, in his glory all resplendent, to this church and to any church when men and women with hearts aflame with love prayerfully listen for his knock, and with flying feet hasten to let him in! That is the word of brave hope for us all.

And, indeed, we do well to remind ourselves over again what churches are for. Nothing is more curious than the fatal facility with which people who have come together for a certain great and clearly defined purpose can wholly lose sight, wholly, absolutely, lose sight of the object they had in coming together. I have been in a college where men were preparing for the ministry of the Gospel. Prior to experience it would have been impossible to believe that foundations could be laid, an institution built, the machinery of education set in motion, and young men gathered from all parts of the land to train for the preaching of the Word, yet where for weeks and months together everybody concerned could live in utter oblivion of the one single purpose of life. I have lived in a sanatorium to which a hundred and twenty men and women had come, each one brought within sight of the Valley of the Great Shadow. Every man and woman amongst them was afflicted by an insidious and terribly dangerous disease, for long centuries believed to be beyond the hope of cure, now, in the blessing of these modern days, known to be as certainly curable as any other ill our flesh is heir to. Every one amongst them knew for himself what his condition was, every one had received the news of the real nature of his illness as he might have received a sentence of death, until hope revived in his soul. And every one knew that upon himself and upon the life he lived depended everything controllable by man of hope of life, or threat of death. And every one had come to that sanatorium with the one single purpose of escaping from the outstretched hand of death.

The Chief Object Neglected

Would you not say that that purpose would be an ever-present, ever-absorbing, passionate reality, gripped with all the tenacity of life, and held on to with the despairing energy of death? And yet I declare to you that for weeks and months again in the case of at least a clear majority of the men and women there, nothing in the world was more remote from the thought than the purpose which had brought them there. Any amusement, any frivolity, any pleasure, any nonsense, any occupation or interest might appeal to them, and they would follow it with indescribable recklessness of consequences, so that the physician at the head of the sanatorium had to be night-watchman, policeman and magistrate all in one. But the thought of seeking the cure they came to find never once occurred to them!

And have you not seen churches where the same forgetfulness of the real and original purpose of churches was as wholly lost? I have. It is charged against preachers often enough that Christ has been hidden in theologies, buried in controversies, lost in denominational prejudice, bitterness, or pride. Can it not be charged against our Church life that Christ has just as often been lost in institutions that were called into existence for the sole purpose of proclaiming his name? And another and more deadly charge, could not it be preferred against us, that Christ has been lost amid the un-Christly things which have come into his Church, stifling aspiration, silencing prayer, dissipating energy sufficient to save a city upon a multitude of trivialities of which grown men and women ought to be ashamed? What are men Christians for? We need to ask the question.

What Churches Are For

And for what do churches exist? You are the salt of the earth. Salt is something which is rubbed into dead matter to prevent it going bad. You are the salt of the earth, rubbed into a society which is dead in its materialism, in its selfishness and sin, to prevent a process of corruption. You are the light of the world, and a city set on a hill cannot be hid. And the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, which has shone into your hearts from the face of Jesus Christ, is to shine again from you into dark hearts and dark homes until his kingdom come, and his will is done on earth as it is done in heaven. Churches exist to hold Christ crucified before the eyes of men; to preach Christ as the ideal of heroic living, Christ as the law of human life, Christ as the world's enduring hope. Churches exist to win men and women to Christ, and to a Christ-like life. That church is successful, because doing the work it exists to do, which makes a few more good men and women, very sure that each one will be a centre and source of goodness again. That church, however rich, however great its numbers, brilliant its leadership and compact its organization, fails, if it is not growing good men and women in its ranks and sending them out, missionaries of goodness, into all its world.

What commonplaces are these! Yet because they are so obvious we lose sight of them! Moreover, organization is a necessity. But there is danger in organization. And the danger is that we should leave the organization to do what can only be done by a living spirit. It is the inevitable tendency of all human organizations to stifle individuality. Let the organization fulfil its tendency and it droops and dies. It is for the individual to assert himself within the organization and if need be against it. By so doing he serves its deepest interests and saves its life. Force and fire brought the organization to the birth, force of will and fire of devotion. By force and fire alone can it be fed and nourished and kept in vigorous life, force of enthusiastic service, fire of consecrated love. The organization is a magnificent piece of machinery. But no mechanical means at present known to mortals will generate energy to set it going or keep it moving. Human heart-beats must supply the driving power.

The Message to the Waiting Hearts

Then here is the promise to the individual and to the Church: if, in the midst of a community wherein many have lost sight of the object of their existence, in the midst of an organization whose forces and fires have begun to droop, any individual will hear the Saviour's knock and will seek to open the door and let him in, Christ will come, and where he comes, his Church will palpitate again with the glad energy of living. He will come to the individual. It is his way. He will come in no other way. God does not speak to committees. He speaks to the waiting and willing heart. It is the one to whom God has spoken who must speak to committees. And when all the members of the committee are willing and waiting to be led to him, and all hear his voice, and all respond, then there is let loose upon the community in which the committee operates the power which in days gone by has turned the world upside down. Behold, I stand at the door of the church and knock. If any one will open the door I will come unto him, and will sup with him—and though the mass of those in the church will not hear, will not heed, will sleep their thick sleep and go their sluggish way, yet this one is friend of Christ, bond-slave no longer but friend, and the Master sups with him!

Do you lament the low vitality of your church in things of the Spirit? Is prayer neglected? Are the words of prayer few, halting, formal? But do you pray! Pray more. Pray better. Pray oftener, with intenser zeal. Enter into the deepest intimacy with your God. Open your own heart to the influences of heaven. So shall you open the door of your non-praying church, and the one who gently knocks will come in. Do you grieve over the sordid and squalid selfishness of men and women in your church? There is no elasticity in their giving? No joy in pouring out their possessions in the service of the Lord? No happiness in counting themselves as stewards of the manifold goodness of God, and spending their best for his cause? Well, stretch your own generosity to the breaking point. Give more than you can afford to give. Give with fine and happy carelessness, not counting what you give, nor calling your left hand to witness what your right hand does. And he who knocks at the door of your miserly church shall come in. Or is your complaint this, that there is no vigorous life in your church, none to work, none to offer hours of every day, and days of every week to the church and school? Then, as far as dwelleth in you, do you labor on, steadfast, immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord. And the promise is to you: I will come to him, and will sup with him, and he with me.

The Sure Remedy

This is better than to rail at the church, to take up your parable against it in the market-place, or write accusations against it in the magazines. Such critics stand, as though rooted and grounded in the earth, waiting for other people to be good; or they elbow their way to a coign of vantage from which they can look upon the real or imagined infirmities of the rest of mankind, then hold up their hands in pious horror at the discovery that other people are uncommonly like themselves. My sister, if gentleness and courtesy and refinement are not as common in your circle as they should be, are you quite satisfied that you are doing all that mortal can do to increase these graces, and to spread them? If things come to such a poor pass in your church, my brother, that you have little good you can truthfully say about it, are you quite clear that there is nothing you can do to improve it? There are some curious people in this world; but to my mind one of the most singular is that benighted person who is forever telling us how bad things are, but never once

METHODISTS TO MEET IN BALTIMORE

THE twenty-fifth quadrennial session of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church will meet in Lyric Hall, Baltimore, Md., Wednesday morning, May 6, 1908, and will continue throughout the month. The General Conference is the governing body and is purely a delegated one, representing 131 annual conferences, nineteen of which are foreign and twenty-one Afro-American.

The conclave will be composed of cleric and lay members in equal proportion. Among the lay members will be a few elect women, perhaps six or eight. The last General Conference, which was the first to admit them, learned that they could easily hold their own in debate.

The morning hours will be devoted to open Conference work and the afternoons to committee meetings, many of which will be numerically as large as the Annual Conferences. The evenings will be largely given to lectures and addresses.

The bishops will preside over the regular Conference sessions in the order of their seniority. Bishop Henry W. Warren, D.D., LL.D., of Denver, Col., the senior active bishop, will open the Conference. Bishop Thomas Bowman, who is ninety years of age, will probably be in attendance, as the Conference is at his door.

Several things combine to make the coming session one of the most notable in the history of the church. It will be within territory preciously reminiscent. Baltimore might be fittingly termed the "cradle of American Methodism." It was in that city and contiguous to it that the followers of Wesley gained their first footing and achieved their greatest victories. Strictly speaking, the first General Conference was organized in Baltimore city in 1792. Unfortunately, the minutes were not preserved. This was followed by four sessions, viz.: 1796, 1800, 1804 and 1808, all of which were held in Baltimore, and were composed of all the ministers then in full membership throughout the entire connection. At the General Conference of 1808, provision was made for a delegated General Conference. May 1, 1812, the first delegated General Conference convened in old John Street Church, New York City. Including this session, there have been twenty-four quadrennial delegated General Conferences, five of which have met in Baltimore (1816, 1820, 1824, 1840 and 1876). Again, after a lapse of thirty-two years, the choice has fallen upon that city, which is a synonym for hospitality. It seems but proper, after a hundred years from the inauguration of a delegated General Conference, that the great conclave should go to this place to celebrate a kind of centenary of splendid, aggressive and successful history. A hundred years ago Bishop Francis Asbury presided, and was in fact the only bishop of which Methodism could then boast. Now she has an episcopacy consisting of thirteen active bishops, six missionary and five superannuated.

During the General Conference a hundred years ago, Bishop Asbury dedicated the Eutaw Street Church on May 8, 1808. The organization has remained intact through all the passing years. This old church has passed through three baptisms of fire: the War of 1812, when the harbor and city were exposed to the fire of the British fleet; the Civil War of the Sixties, and the awful conflagration of more recent years. Eutaw Street Church is beautifully adapted to meet the present needs. This church ranks historically with St. George's of Philadelphia, old John Street Church of New York, and the Stone Chapel, which marks the spot where Strawbridge erected the first Methodist log meeting house in America, in 1764, in Frederick County, Maryland. These are venerated as shrines by the followers of Wesley. Of the four, St. George's of Philadelphia bears the distinction of being the oldest (1763).

The quadrennium drawing to a close has been characterized by a closer fraternity between the several branches of Methodism, creating the hope that at least federation, if not actual organic union, may be realized in the near future. There has been a steady and satisfactory growth. Perhaps the greatest success and growth have been in foreign fields, and the record of the home church in standing by the foreign work has been of the most loyal type, both as to men and money. No church can fail that shows such splendid devotion to the missionary cause.

The episcopal bench has been deprived by death of some of its most princely men, including Merrill, of the Websterian type; Andrews and Joyce, the evangelists; Fitzgerald, the parliamentarian, and McCabe, the irrepressible Boanerges. Other men, great in the councils of the church, will doubtless be called upon to wear the episcopal mantle, but just how many will be elevated is a matter of conjecture. Worthy of mention are Drs. W. A. Quale, Homer C. Stuntz, J. T. McFarland, George Elliott, Frank M. Bristol, E. H. Hughes, W. S. Lewis, George P. Eckman, Ward H. Platt, R. J. Cooke and T. E. Fleming, all of whom are regarded as good available episcopal timber.

The election of a bishop is of prime interest and is preceded by earnest prayer. The election is by the two-thirds rule. The editorial and secretarial force, together with the publishing agents, are nominated and elected by majority vote. Many important questions will be brought forward. Here are a few that will probably command attention: "Districting of the Bishops," "Elective Presiding Eldership," "Remodeling of the Office," "The Pastoral Tenure," "Unification of Publishing Houses," "Change of Ratio in Representation," "Permanent Conference Claimant Fund," "Deaconess Work on a Permanent Basis" and perhaps a little tinkering with the famous paragraph 248, which bears upon the amusement question. The last General Conference retained the paragraph by such an overwhelming vote as to almost preclude the probability of resurrection.

W. M. LEMEN.

stirs hand or foot in the effort to make them better. When Tennyson's furious and more than half-insane hero, who has flung his curses right and left with a frenzy which only a Tennyson could describe, at last comes to his senses, he has to admit,

We have proved we have hearts in a cause, we are noble still.

And myself have awakened, as it seems, to the better mind;

It is better to fight for the good than to rail at the ill;

I have felt with my native land, I am one with my kind,

I embrace the purpose of God, and the doom assigned.

There is a world of good Gospel in that. It is better to fight for the good than to rail at the ill. Let a man feel with his fellows; be one with his kind; let him embrace the purpose of God; and he will find it no "doom" which is assigned him, but joy, blessing, peace and happy content. If any man will hear my voice and open the door, I will come to him, and will sup with him, and he with me.

So, then, this is the plain teaching. Whatever others may or may not do, or whatsoever they may leave undone, as for you, do you open to Christ's knock, and let him in. But all along I have assumed, though I have not stated, what remains to be said. We ground ourselves on the ascertained and tabulated facts of human nature, when we declare that there is no community to be found on the face of the whole earth where one man may hear the voice of Christ and let him in, without others hastening also to his call, offering him open heart and open door, and longing to become the guest of such a host! In plain words, we ground ourselves upon common human experience when we declare that it is not possible, in any community, for one person to cherish a high ideal and live continuously in open obedience to that ideal, without other lives being touched to finer issues. I do not know whether any person can be really bad without making others bad; but I do know that in this world as God made it, this world as we know it, no person can really try to be good without, unconsciously though it be, helping some other person to be better. -This, let the pessimists say what they will, this is the elemental fact of human nature; there is that in our hearts which is touched by the presence of goodness, which appreciates it, is moved by it, and in the long run will respond to it. It is this which makes all redemptive effort, all missionary propaganda, all teaching and preaching of the Gospel "worth while." Deep down in the human heart, crushed, stifled, buried if you will, but living still, is something which can respond to the goodness and the love of Christ. So, if any one hear his voice and will let him in, it will not be to himself alone that he welcomes Christ; sooner or later—later it may seem to our noble impatience—but not too late for the purpose of God, inevitably, others in his circle, in his community, in his Church, will seek to sit at the Master's table.

In the works of the professional commentators you will find this image of Christ standing at the door, knocking, and entering in to sup with the willing soul, referred back to a line in the Song of Songs. The suggestion to me is far-fetched and absurd. The figure was born of memories folded within the loving heart of John. Weary with the labors of the day, the vital forces drained by much preaching and teaching, the crowds pressing upon him, and the excitement which filled Galilee down to its utmost edge with talk of him, every evening Jesus went forth from John's home where he lodged in the city. He found his way to the silent spaces of the mountain side. He refreshed his body with deep, deep draughts of the cool night air, and his soul with fellowship with God. At home sat the well-beloved disciple, waiting his return. By the flickering light of the oil lamp he read in the Scriptures of his race the words of prophecy which were even then being fulfilled in the person of his God-like guest. And as the hours passed and anxiety about him grew, he mounted to the roof and peered through the starlight for the figure of One who seemed so long in coming, or descended to the narrow, wind-swept street to see if he was near. Then he returned to the scroll of the Psalms or the precious copy of Isaiah, and waited still. At length came the footfall he had learned to know, the welcome knock, the haste to let him in, and the simple evening meal. John for a time was host in his own house, and never man entertained a fairer guest; but soon the parts were reversed. Inevitably, Christ took the place that was his. He breaks the bread, and blesses the cup, and the disciple sups with him. How do I know? The heart has its reasons! And well I know that in this church, and in every church, and in every city, and in every village, disciples whom Jesus loves still keep the light in the window burning for him, as they wait and watch intently for his coming. And through the roar of city streets I hear his gentle promise, sweeter than distant music on a moonlit sea, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock; if any man hear my voice and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me."

BURYING COLLINWOOD'S DEAD

TWICE have the streets of Collinwood, Ohio, been lined by crowds of people who stood, silently and sadly, while they watched the most remarkable funeral processions in our history pass by—processions such as the most hardened spectator prayed that he would never have cause to see again. The funerals were those of the victims of the late horrible conflagration at the Collinwood school, where at least one hundred and seventy-two children and two teachers lost their lives in the wild stampede, and in the fire which followed.

On the first day the identified dead were buried by the surviving members of their families. Starting at nine o'clock in the morning, there were at least ten funerals an hour until late in the afternoon. There were over forty separate funerals held from various homes and churches, while in one church in the morning a solemn service was held over the remains of sixteen little ones, while in another twelve small coffins shone white in the gloom of the chancel. The clergyman's voice choked with emotion.

Friends from far and near came to pay their last loving tributes and gathered with tear-dimmed eyes about the caskets of the little friends who had lately shed rays of summer sunshine in the hearts of their fathers and mothers and of their playmates. Flowers seemed to come from everywhere, and there was not a casket but bore a great bunch of white blossoms that seemed to speak silently, and yet eloquently, of the eternal hope.

There were not enough hearses, though many had been sent in from other districts, to bear the bodies to the cemeteries, and the trolley cars were pressed into service to make a funeral train. The cars each held several coffins, and the fronts and sides were draped with festoons of white and black cloth. Slowly this remarkable cortege made its way toward the outskirts of the town. Without a jar, almost noiselessly, the heavy cars moved, carrying their silent passengers to their final resting places. The people stood in groups along the route, the men with bared heads as the cars swept by, and there were few, even in the green earth their dear ones would rest. At the last report it was found that at least six children are missing, and it is thought that their ashes are still in the mass of debris in the bottom of the school cellar.

Mr. Frank Whitney, the superintendent of the village schools of Collinwood, made a house-to-house canvas of the entire Lakeview School District, in which all of the pupils who attended the school lived. Six were missing and twenty-two eight, has been missing since the fire, and it is now supposed that he gave his life in an effort to save some of the children's lives. It is thought that Miss Weiller's body is entirely lost. Two of the bodies taken from the ruins were buried in Oswego, N. Y., and the funerals there were attended by a large concourse of people.

The fire has really become a national and international affair. School committees all over the United States have been investigating the buildings under their charge, and it has been found, in many cases, that their arrangements offered a chance for such a disaster as occurred at Collinwood. In these cases, the schools were closed for one or two weeks, while the necessary alterations were made.

Europe has been interested and several countries, including England and Germany, have made surveys of many of their buildings. Messages of sympathy with the people of Collinwood in their great sorrow were sent by the heads of many foreign governments.

The mayor of Budapest, Hungary, at the opening of a recent session of the municipal council, spoke of the Collinwood fire. He said he believed that some children of Hungarian immigrants were among the victims. The council passed a resolution of sympathy with the parents of Collinwood, which was cabled to America. In a New York school, about two days after the disaster in Ohio, a fire broke out and the teachers, with the previous fire in mind, quickly formed their classes. In a few moments all of the two thousand or more pupils were safely out in the street. The fire was quickly extinguished.

among the strongest, who did not break down at this, the end of the great tragedy.

The second day set apart for the funerals was for the "unknown dead," and of these there were many. It was perhaps more heartrending than the first day, as the parents who had been unable to identify the bodies of their children suffered untold misery as they thought they would never exactly know in which spot unidentified out of the hundred and sixty-seven bodies taken from the ruins. Several who were rescued died later, adding to the total.

It was found that the body which was supposed to be that of the heroic Miss Weiller, the teacher who attempted to stem the mad rush of her pupils to destruction, was that of some other person. It is believed to be that of a man. One of the rescuers, a young man of twenty-

LINCOLN has hallowed the log cabin. I can never pass one of those little blind log cabins without thinking of the possible Lincoln within, and wishing we might give him at least the six books which formed the library of our president in his youth," said Dr. William Goodell Frost, addressing an audience assembled at the home of Miss Helen Gould on a recent afternoon, in the interests of Berea College.

Berea is well known as an educational centre which has been doing good work for many years. Established in 1855, the liberal sentiment of its supporters was such that it has admitted colored students since 1866, and in all the years no cause for rebuke or reproach has been given by the negroes. The recent law passed in Kentucky requiring separate provision for the two races, came as a great trial to the school, just as it had begun to feel able to fulfil its mission. Although it is expected that the United States Supreme Court will declare the law unconstitutional, Berea will not avail itself of such decision, but will conform with the wishes of the State as expressed in the new law.

To carry forward its mountain work unimpaired, and at the same time to establish an effective colored school, an "Adjustment Fund" of $400,000 is proposed. Mr. Carnegie has pledged $200,000, and others have added $80,500, so that the amount now required is only $119,500. The treasurer is Thomas J. Osborne, Berea, N. Y.

"A dollar spent at Berea is a dollar put into the building of a man or a woman," said Hamilton W. Mabie in his address. We provincial Eastern people did not know about the Cumberland Mountains until Miss Murfree and John Fox, in his 'Little Shepherd of Kingdom Come,' introduced us to those wonderful men full of audacity, love of adventure, courage and the great human passion for action. After the Revolution, thousands of men and women of English and Scottish blood settled in that mountain region, and their descendants have grown up a community of themselves, until they now number 3,000,000, forming their own institutions, making their own laws, solving their own problems in their own way. Their solitude was first broken by the cannon of the Civil War. Then 180,000 loyal men formed a solid wedge thrust down into the South as an impassable barrier of protection for the Northern States. We are here presented with a great problem, dealing with 3,000,000 people with primitive virtues and primitive faults, uninfluenced by the outside world."

Mrs. Frost describes "the mountain mother" as a signer of the Declaration of Independence. These mountain women, leading isolated lives, are keen for news from the outside world. "One reason we take to shootin' each other here in the mountains is because we don't have nothin' else to think about," commented one in conversation with Mrs. Frost.

"The teaching of such a college as Berea," said the Rev. Percy S. Grant, "constitutes a missionary enterprise. The teachers are just as much missionaries as any in foreign lands. Most of these teachers are working for only one-half the pay they would receive in a Northern school. President Frost cut in two the salary he was receiving in a Northern college when he went down there to take up this life of unutterable hardships."

"What Hampton has done in adapting conditions to the negro, Berea is doing in adapting conditions to the mountaineer," said President Frost. "We not only welcome our 1,250 students who come to us, but we go books in hand to the homes endeavoring to sow the seeds of education and citizenship. These valleys must soon overflow into surrounding parts of the country. Shall they overflow with people who have no ideas of town government or of any of the conventional proprieties of accepted civilization? The usual settler going West to seek new territory takes ideas with him from what he has seen; these mountaineers have no such ideas to take elsewhere; they are quite primitive. Pupils of our school are hailed as leaders when they return to their homes. One of our boys has now been sent to the State Legislature. He is coming back to school again when Legislature adjourns."

"Here we have a community of loyal citizens, red-hot Protestants, the Abe Lincoln kind of people, who need immediate training for self-help. The mountain work is of national importance. Much time and thought have been given to solving the problem of the city. In finding cures for the adverse conditions of mountain life, we shall solve the rural problem (as real as the city problem) for all the world."

How the St. Paul Fought the Terror

By REAR ADMIRAL CHARLES D. SIGSBEE, United States Navy

IT is required of me that I write again of my personal experiences. Looking back on my naval career, it appears that I have been repeatedly in danger from submarine explosive agencies, and probably to a degree without parallel in the United States Navy for a single individual.

As a young officer, in our Civil War, I spent many a night watch, with my binocular glasses resting on the rail, sweeping the water for makeshift torpedo boats, as well as for blockade runners. It is well-known history that some of our blockading vessels were blown up by such boats.

At the battle of Mobile Bay, I was next to the head of the column when the fleet passed over the mines. For taking his vessels over, Farragut got great credit. Fortunately there were no losses from mines then called torpedoes—except in the case of the Tecumseh. That vessel was blown up and sunk close to my ship, the Brooklyn. All on board were lost save ten men from the turret. Some of our vessels, however, made contact with mines. Their people between decks heard the fuses exploding under the bottom of the ship.

I commanded the Maine when she was blown up in Havana Harbor on the night of February 15, 1898. The forward half of the Maine was blown to tatters. Of her people, 252 were killed at once, and 8 died in hospital afterwards. She had 26 officers and 328 men. Of these, all but four officers were on board. Only 16 of the men were wholly uninjured. I was writing in my cabin when the explosion came.

In the war with Spain I commanded the St. Paul. She was the American liner of that name hastily transformed into a cruiser for the war. She was of 16,000 tons displacement and carried six 5-inch guns, six 6-pounder and six 3-pounder guns, all rapid firing rifles. Half of each were on each broadside. She was an enormous ship with a small battery and was classed as an auxiliary cruiser. Her principal duty, as first intended, was scouting—to get in touch with the enemy and report him. In her structure she was very vulnerable. Her protection lay in her speed.

On May 19, 1898, the Spanish Admiral Cervera arrived at Santiago de Cuba. With him were the armored cruisers Maria Teresa, Vizcaya, Oquendo and Colon; also the destroyers Furor and Pluton. The St. Paul reached there on the morning of May 21. She was the first United States vessel to arrive after Cervera entered. She was there by virtue of the following cable dispatch from the Navy Department, received at Cape Haitien on May 19:

"Proceed at once off Santiago; the Spanish fleet reported there; Schley ordered there; communicate occasionally."

In a previous dispatch, setting me a certain scouting service elsewhere, the Navy Department had directed me to avoid being captured. So off Santiago my duty was plain—to scout effectively within the limitations of non-capture. During daylight the St. Paul would remain in sight of the Morro. At night I used stratagems to avoid night attack by the destroyers. I lack of them, he tried for a whole month to get outside to attack Sampson's vessels, but was prevented by the illumination of the entrance by Sampson's searchlights. Certain records show that the destroyers were outside once or twice, at night, while the St. Paul was there. The risk to the St. Paul was critical. Had she been cleverly attacked at night, by both destroyers at once, the chances would have been much against her. At least my responsibility as captain was a lively one. The edge of a risk is acutely whetted to one who must bear the chief responsibility in situations of emergency.

On May 25, the St. Paul captured the collier Restormel off Santiago, whereby Cervera was deprived of further coal supply. The capture was made in plain sight of the entrance. It was seen at the Morro and reported. It is now known that the Colon and one of the destroyers were down near the entrance at the time, and with steam up. I believed attempted rescue so imminent that I made the Restormel steam full speed due south—away from the port.

The next and last occasion of my exposure to submarine attack is the principal topic of this article—viz., the St. Paul's engagement with the cruiser Isabel II, and the destroyer Terror, off San Juan, Porto Rico. The Terror was the third of Cervera's destroyers. She parted company with the Spanish squadron at Martinique and thence went to San Juan, while the Pluton and Furor continued with the cruisers to Curacao and Santiago. First and last, therefore, the St. Paul was in hostile company, and alone, with all three of the Spanish destroyers.

On June 13, the St. Paul, after a visit to New York, was again off Santiago. Admiral Sampson informed me that I might expect orders to proceed with the St. Paul to establish a blockade of San Juan single-handed. That port was credited by Admiral Sampson with twenty-one modern 8-inch guns, some 10-inch and 12-inch guns and a number of others of modern design. He also said that in the harbor were six war vessels, as follows: One cruiser, three gunboats, an armed transport of the St. Paul's strength and a destroyer. The information given me was correct. The Spanish vessels were the cruiser Isabel II, the gunboats Concha, Ponce and Criollo, the armed transport Alfonso XIII, and the destroyer Terror. The Admiral smiled when he said that the St.

Paul must blockade the port quite alone; but he promised support as soon as other vessels could be obtained. Neither of us cared for aught but the Terror. As a vessel of stealth and nocturnal habits, when properly used, she was something of a bugaboo. Still, it was a goodly force for one improvised, auxiliary cruiser to blockade or even to bluff.

The St. Paul remained eight days off Santiago—until the arrival of Commodore Schley's squadron. During five days and nights she was alone. She was a shining mark for torpedo attack more than a tenth of a statute mile in length, drawing about twenty-six feet of water, and her huge funnels pouring out black volumes of smoke eighty-four feet above the water. Her crew was newly enlisted and made up of many elements. She had had but one target practice. That was in sight of the Morro of Santiago on the morning of her arrival.

An attack by Cervera's destroyers was provided for nightly. It was inconceivable that they should not try if they were there. According to the captain of one

The Spectre of Famine in India

THERE was a hope, until within a few weeks ago, that the threatened famine in India had been averted by the refreshing rains that fell in the Central Provinces. At that time, as our readers will remember, in view of the general anxiety, the editor of this journal sent a message by the cable to Lord Minto, governor-general of India, inquiring as to actual conditions and proffering aid, if relief were needed. To that message Lord Minto cabled in reply that the distress was not yet so acute as to warrant an appeal to America's liberality. This was supplemented by a letter from the Viceroy's secretary, which was still hopeful.

That this hope, after flickering for months, has unfortunately died out, and that an actual famine crisis is near, is made evident in this latest cable message received from the Viceroy's secretary:

Calcutta, March 11.

Dr. LOUIS KLOPSCH, New York:

One million and a half people now receiving famine relief and Viceroy is forming charitable fund. Any assistance from America will be appreciated and can be usefully applied.

It is clear from the foregoing authoritative statement that the situation is a serious one, since it justifies the government in appealing for outside aid. Measures seem to have been taken in due season to meet the emergency; but if we may judge from past visitations, the sweep of a famine in India is so vast and widespread, and her population so multitudinous, that no human preparation, short of that which would involve the entire resources of her government, would be adequate to stem the suffering.

Let us hope that India may be providentially spared a repetition of the horrors of the last great famine. Should the worst fears be realized, the benevolently disposed in other lands will doubtless come to her aid. Our American missionaries, sustained by the generosity of their friends at home, will be found among the foremost in the work of succoring the distressed.

The Poor in Our Cities

EACH passing year makes more complex the problem of poverty and the housing and care of the poor in our great cities. Society seems to be no nearer a solution, although the matter is one that has been discussed many times in all of its varied aspects. In New York the city fathers, the pastors and the sociologists have given it frequent consideration, but the situation remains unrelieved. Well nigh half the city downtown is given over to a vast heterogeneous mass of Italians, Jews, Russians, Greeks, Germans and Scandinavians, who are huddled together so closely that the congestion has become a serious menace to the general health.

At a recent meeting held in New York expressly to consider this urgent problem, Dr. Felix Adler, an eminent sociologist, told his auditors plainly that all the methods adopted thus far for the relief of the congestion and the assuagement of human suffering had proved utterly futile. Crowded tenements, high rents and the herding of men, women and children together like cattle constituted conditions incapable of relief. The actual monetary burdens of the thrifty poor he declared were far greater than those of the wealthy. Settlement work, public parks, libraries, and all the various recreations and attractions furnished by well-meaning people did not and could not meet the situation. What was needed was plenty of work for the unemployed and wholesome surroundings. Other speakers advocated relieving the congestion by the wholesale removal of factories, workshops and tenement dwellers to the suburbs.

Such measures, even if they were practicable, while they might afford temporary relief to a few thousands, would hardly affect general conditions. Labor colonies and the establishment of municipal works on a large scale would also no doubt afford partial relief. But these suggestions do not reach the real root of the problem. If it were possible to distribute the unemployed multitudes of New York throughout the country, where they could find steady work at living wages, we might see more substantial results; but large appropriations would be needed for so gigantic a deportation. Besides, the official cooperation of the various States would be indispensable to the success of the scheme.

Truly, it is a hard problem at which the sociologists are tinkering. And the hardest part of it is that grim residue of the prevalent congestion, the unemployed, whose representatives are to be found in the "Bread Line." Professional philanthropists and superficial observers have decried the "Bread Line," and inveighed against what has been crudely termed "indiscriminate charity," as tending to "pauperize the people." Nothing could be further from the truth. What "pauperizes the people" is not the helping hand they occasionally get at a pinch from their sympathetic brothers and sisters, but low sweat-shop wages, exorbitant rents, high prices for food caused by cornering the necessities of life, labor strikes, panics, wholesale enforced idleness, privation and sickness. For how much or how little of this the poor themselves are responsible any fair-minded person can judge. As to the criticisms of the "Bread Line," and its simple, elementary way of relieving hunger, those who hold it to be a duty to share their abundance with "their brothers in need" care but little. They are equally indifferent to praise or censure. To permit a man or woman to starve because they do not know their antecedents they would regard as a crime against God and nature. They remember, too, how Christ fed the hungry multitudes under conditions which might have rendered him liable to the charge by the Pharisees of "pauperizing the people."

This is the working theory of the "Bread Line" and, indeed, of all elementary benevolences. It has its springs deep in human sympathy. Besides, it should not be forgotten that your workingman, however poor, is not a beggar. He may be toilworn, hard of hand, rugged of face and weather tanned, or he may be weakened by want and suffering; but he is neither shirk nor criminal, but a man who will grasp at work as a drowning swimmer clutches at a rope. To those who regard the "Bread Line" as putting a premium upon idleness we would merely say: Investigate it for yourself, and you will speedily be convinced of the injustice you have been doing unwittingly to the deserving poor.

A Wonderful Record

THERE have recently appeared in some of our papers and magazines severe criticisms of the construction of our American battleships, which have caused a great deal of alarm to parents all over the country whose sons have donned the blue and are serving their country on the high seas. The relatives and friends of the sailor men have felt that if the young men stand ready to give their best service and their lives for their country, if need be, they should have the best ships to serve upon which American genius and mechanical skill can provide.

These hostile criticisms, while perhaps true in a few minor details, have not been supported by our most practical ship-builders, and the American people may feel sure that there are no better vessels afloat than those which have just completed the wonderful trip to Magdalena Bay in Lower California. The great fleet, without a single "straggler ship" left behind, arrived two days ahead of schedule time and in better condition, so the wireless dispatch reads, than when they left Hampton Roads. The machinery has been keyed up, and a spirit of emulation among the crews has put everything about the vessels in ship-shape order.

Along with the report about the ships came another, which all who have followed the news from the fleet will be glad to hear. It was from Admiral Robley D. Evans himself, and read, "I am much improved in health, all reports to the contrary notwithstanding." So again the alarmists will have to look elsewhere for reports wherewith to fill the pages of the more sensational press, and to worry those whose loved ones are making the great cruise. Admiral Evans and his men have made a record for practical seamanship that will be hard to equal.

In addition, it should not be forgotten that the cruise has cemented strongly the bonds of friendship between South and North America. At every port at which the fleet touched it received an ovation, and the South Americans did all possible to show that next to their own country the United States had their highest esteem.

Magnanimous Haiti

ALTHOUGH the recent revolutionary movement in Haiti seems to have been little more than a "tempest in a teapot," it threatened at one stage to become sufficiently tragic. When the government of President Nord Alexis had succeeded, by the employment of strong measures, in suppressing the rebellion, there was a sudden stampede among those connected with the movement. Foreigners who had been involved in the rising sought refuge in the different consulates at Port de Paix, a number finding shelter in the American consulate. Having been caught in open rebellion against the regularly constituted government of Haiti their position was one of grave peril.

A few Europeans appealed to their governments for protection, and it was arranged that they should remain in the consulates while their trials proceeded, after which the Powers, it was believed, would urge lenity on the part of the Haitian president.

It must have been something in the nature of a pleasing surprise to the refugees and their friends when a few days later President Alexis sent an order to the Haitian War Minister, authorizing the immediate release of all refugees sheltered in the American Consulate. This act of executive clemency was performed at the request of a representative of the New York Herald, who appealed personally to the President in behalf of the prisoners. I will probably be followed by the pardon and deportation of all the refugees in the other consulates.

In this matter little Haiti has set a notable example of magnanimity to other governments. Its course will assuredly raise it in the estimation of Americans through whose intercession the concession was granted.

Among the Workers

—EVANGELIST GEISENHEIMER, of Decatur, Ill., has been assisting in revival meetings in Cedar Bluffs, Kan., for about three weeks. Twenty-one have made public profession thus far.

—EVANGELIST E. R. HERMISTON has just closed a series of meetings at Boise, Idaho. All classes were reached, old and young judges and gamblers, and in one week one hundred and twenty came forward. Most of these have presented themselves for church membership.

—A PENTECOSTAL SHOWER has visited the town of North East, Pa., through the presentation of the Gospel by Evangelists Reed and Bennard. There were many seekers for pardon. Ninety-five names have been added to the M. E. Church, and other churches are also receiving additions.

—WE ARE INDEBTED to Missionary Frederick Jansen for the very interesting photograph on the cover page of this issue, showing a "Market Day at Cebu," in the Philippines. These picturesque people are in the hundred-island parish under the spiritual care of Mr. Jansen and his associate workers.

—IN THE evangelistic campaign in Philadelphia, conducted by J. Wilbur Chapman and Charles M. Alexandet, fifty evangelists and Gospel singers assist. The city is divided into forty districts, and special meetings are held in saloons, railway shops and other places. It is a union effort. The campaign will continue for about five weeks.

—REV. H. D. SHELLEN, one of the Chapman workers, held a series of spiritual meetings at Shelton, Conn., lately. The Congregational, Baptist and Methodist churches united. They were very successful. At least ten per cent. of the Protestant population signed inquirers' cards. Mr. Shelden was assisted by Mr. B. F. Butts as soloist and chorus leader.

—DR. SMILEY, of Denver, and his Gospel singer have just closed a union meeting at Malvern, Ia., with a spiritual uplift to all the churches. Merchants closed their stores at half-past six each evening, that they and their clerks might attend. One entire day was given over to prayer, when eleven services were held. It was like a Sunday in the middle of the week. The churches continue the union meetings, though the evangelists have gone to Lyons, Neb., to direct a union effort there.

To Explore the Antarctic

NEWS comes from Christchurch, New Zealand, that the Nimrod has returned to that port after taking the Shackelton party to the scene of their operations. It will be remembered that Lieutenant Shackelton of the British Navy, who was a member of the Discovery expedition under Capt. K. T. Scott in 1902, publicly declared his intention of renewing the exploration of the Antarctic. He set out from England in July last for New Zealand, whence the exploring expedition was to start on its adventurous journey early last month. A hearty and cordial godspeed was given to him when he bade farewell to his native shores. The King bestowed the Victorian Order upon him, and Queen Alexandra presented him with a flag for the vessel then waiting for him in New Zealand. On his arrival there no time was lost in completing preparations. A specially constructed motor car for dragging sledges over flat ice was put on board, and a number of Manchurian ponies and Siberian dogs were added to the equipment. There was also a wooden shelter lined with felt and granulated cork as a refuge for the explorers during the winter darkness. The explorers said goodbye to civilization, and the Nimrod with its crew of twenty men sailed for the unknown. It was arranged that she should carry the twelve explorers to some suitable camping-place as far south as possible, leave them there and return, to go back for them early next year. She now reports that she put them ashore at a point about eight hundred miles from the South Pole. This is not far from Scott's old camping-ground, with which Shackelton is familiar. He plans, however, to proceed by a more easterly route toward the Pole, believing that the ice in that direction is less hummocky. Though he expects to stay only one year, he has provisions for two years. The brave explorers are going into an utterly unknown region never yet trodden by men—a region of darkness, mystery, and perhaps of peril. We may hope that like the Christian entering that mysterious land beyond the grave they are able to say:

Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me. (Ps. 23 : 4.)

Chasing a Runaway Train

A thrilling story comes from Portland, Me., of the capture of a string of loaded freight cars, that came near wrecking the Portland-Montreal express with two hundred passengers on board. Just as the last car of the express on the Grand Trunk bound for Montreal passed Copperville, N. H., a wild train of twenty cars, loaded with pulpwood, and without a locomotive, which had broken loose on a siding two miles away, shot on to the main line, and, gaining speed every minute, plunged along toward Portland. At Berlin, five miles away, a big mogul engine, with steam up, happened to be on a siding. The operator at Copperville wired: "Look out, runaway freight coming!" The last click of the message had hardly been received when the runaway, going at a mile and a half a minute, rushed past the Berlin station. The engineer and fireman were in the cab of the mogul. They knew the train was a runaway before the telegraph operator could tell them. The big engine snorted and trembled as she went in pursuit. The runaway had the lead, and the only hope of overtaking it was in its losing speed on a three-mile rise before reaching Shelburne. The momentum carried it up the hill, and not until it arrived at the top was it caught and the coupling to the mogul made. Then it was dragged back and an almost inevitable wreck averted. It was providential that the engine was there to follow it and bring it back. One shudders to think of what might have occurred if it had not been checked in its blind insensate course. We can but wish that there was a similar way to check the sinner. When started once on the downward track, he is carried on by his own momentum to his own destruction and that of others.

Then he is gracious unto him, and saith, Deliver him from going down to the pit; I have found a ransom. (Job 33 : 24.)

A Bride's Consternation

A family in Brooklyn, N. Y., were entertaining the recently married sister of the head of the household and her husband, who were on their wedding trip. The family party was startled by the entrance of the police, who arrested the young bridegroom on the charge of robbing a house in Riverdale, N. J. The bride was utterly overcome. She protested her husband's innocence, and insisted on accompanying him to the police station. There she told the lieutenant that the charge was preposterous, and assured him that a deplorable mistake had been made. The husband was in another room undergoing a searching examination. When he returned the wife rushed to him, declaring he was the victim of mistaken identification, and said she would stand by him to the last. To her horror she was told that the man had confessed his guilt, and, looking in his downcast face, she saw it was true. The shock was so great that she fell to the floor in a swoon. When she was revived she no longer wanted to go to her husband. "I loved him so," she said. "I was so proud of him. He was the trusted caretaker of the home he robbed. He resigned the position only to be married. It is incredible that he was a thief all the time." She shrank from him with loathing, yet outwardly he was the same man that she had loved and married. Her love was completely dead, and not even if the man reformed could he win it back. In that her love, like that of all mortals, differs from the love of Christ, who, seeing us as we are, and knowing all about us, loves us in spite of our faults.

In that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us. (Rom. 5 : 8.)

Fall of an Avalanche

A cable dispatch from Berne, Switzerland, reports the descent of an avalanche near the village of Goppenstein. A company is now engaged there constructing a tunnel to be known as the Loetschen Tunnel, and has erected a hotel for the convenience of the engineers and others engaged in the work. It was the dinner hour and the inmates were seated at the table when two children ran in screaming, "An avalanche!" There was a rush to escape, but the building collapsed before any one could leave. The crash came so suddenly that escape was impossible. Thirteen persons were killed, including the two children, and fifteen were injured. It is a curious fact that the hotel collapsed before it was struck by the avalanche. It fell before the air-wave which preceded the fall of the avalanche. Engineers in this country to whom the report was shown said that the phenomenon was common in such cases. The snow gathered in a huge mass, starting down the mountain side at a terrific rate, sending before it a mighty gust of wind. This atmospheric pressure was quite powerful enough to overthrow an unsubstantial structure such as the hotel was. How mighty are the forces of nature, and how feeble the power of man to oppose them! Not only the avalanche itself but the atmospheric disturbance it initiated proved destructive. It is strange that in spite of such warnings men should have the temerity to defy the God who controls such forces, and should take refuge in the frail shelters that philosophy has constructed, which will at the last perish before the breath of his anger.

When they shall say, Peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them. (1. Thess. 5 : 3.)

An Unconscious Heir

Search is being made in Eastern Pennsylvania for a young man who gives his name as James. He ran away about three years ago from a farmer in Susquehanna County to whom he had been apprenticed. An orphan asylum apprenticed him to the farmer, so the boy, who is now about twenty years old, believes himself to be an orphan. The fact, however, as was discovered some time afterwards, is that he is the son of parents of good social position, who at the time of his birth were in dire poverty and affliction. The mother was in New York City sick and in want. Her husband, the boy's father, had suddenly disappeared and she had no resource but to send the boy to the asylum. She believed he had been murdered. It is now learned that he had been struck down by thieves, and had been found near the docks, unconscious, with an injury to the skull. When he recovered a strange although not unprecedented thing happened. All recollection of his name and past life had gone, and, being among sailors, he readily consented to go on shipboard to fill the place of a sick sailor. After his voyage he went to Nevada and Colorado, where he found friends and prospered. All those years he had completely lost his identity, but recently he had to go to a hospital for treatment and the old injury to the skull was then discovered and was treated. The recollection of his name and past life returned to him immediately and he came East to find his wife and son. He has a considerable fortune, which the son will inherit if the search for him is successful. The youth may be bearing hardship and poverty, unconscious that he has a wealthy father searching for him. How gladly would he go to that father if he only knew! Yet the sinner in like circumstances often hears, unmoved, that his heavenly Father is waiting to receive him and make him heir of all things.

If children, then he is : heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ. (Rom. 8 : 17.)

Offered to Risk Life

In some unexplained way a report came into circulation that the Government was seeking men to submit to a dangerous experience. The men, according to the report, were wanted to go into the turret of the monitor Florida, and remain there while guns were fired at it to test the resisting strength of the turret's armor. Incidentally it was desired to demonstrate the explosive power of a new shell. Two men, one from New Jersey and one from Kentucky, wrote to the Navy Department offering their services. They declared themselves ready to go into the turret while the tests were made and to report the results of the tests. The department informed these volunteers that no human beings would be allowed to go into the turret during the test, but praised their courage and readiness for self-sacrifice and suggested that men of that character would be welcome if they were to enlist in the navy. Men are desired in that service who think more of the interests of their country than of their own lives, and in every emergency such men have been found. The cause of Christ, too, has had many such among its followers—men who have willingly braved death by the sword, or by fire, or by cruel torture, rather than save their own lives by disloyalty to Christ.

None of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy. (Acts 20 : 24.)

A PALACE OF THE PAST

By
LOUIS M. WATERMAN

"In the arms of love enfolded!"

I
HAVE looked on marble mansions
Crowned with turrets and with domes;
I have reveled in the beauty
Of earth's rare palatial homes;
But not one of these seems shining
With a glory that shall last,
Like that dear old home of childhood,
My fair palace of the past.

II
Never once guessed I its glory
While as yet I lingered there,
For on every side were houses
That to me seemed far more fair;
But long years of tears and trials
Have a halo o'er it cast,
Till I see now, oh, how plainly,
'Tis a palace of the past!

III
In that home I dwelt in grandeur that a king can never know,
For my mouth was filled with laughter and my heart had not a woe!
And in arms of love enfolded I was dowered with riches vast,
For affections were the treasures of that palace of the past.

IV
What a retinue of servants
Waited on my bidding there:
Clad each one in lovingkindness—
Richer robes than princes wear!
How those hands would haste to help me,
And those feet would follow fast
To supply each childish craving
In my palace of the past!

V
And those faces that bent o'er me
In that happy home once mine,
Lo, they gleam like stars at midnight,
And forever shall they shine!
Time has touched all those that linger
And o'er some death's veil is cast,
But to me they are immortal
In my palace of the past!

"One face above all others Must with peerless lustre glow"

VI
And one face above all others
Must with peerless lustre glow—
Yea, a sweeter, nobler vision
On this earth I ne'er shall know!
Round that face like clustering jewels
All bright memories are massed,
For my mother was the princess
Of my palace of the past!

"O thou haunt of happy childhood!"

VII
O thou haunt of happy childhood!
Shrined for aye within my heart,
More art thou than recollection—
Thou a holy prophet art!
For when God unveils that mansion
Where all hope shall be surpassed,
Lo, on heavenly heights, transfigured,
See, my palace of the past!

A wise policy for the Spaniards would have been to send out their entire force against us, holding the Terror ready to make her dash. I would then have had to fight the whole force or retire. Had I retired, the foreign consuls in San Juan would probably have reported to their governments that the Spaniards had raised the blockade. This they surely would have done, had the Spanish vessels remained outside for several days, and permitted merchant vessels to enter and leave freely. Neutrals will not concede a blockade unless it is effective. It must be established with certain notice and formalities. If raised it must be re-established in the same way, if at all. The aggregation failed to come my way. My further narrative will show what was actually done. Would I have fought all of them? How do I know? I am a retired officer. Courage as an afterthought has no quality. The St. Paul, while scouting, would have been justified, under her orders, in avoiding any fight that would have interfered with her emergency reports to her government. At San Juan the case was different. Her duty then was to maintain the blockade, which is a forceful measure always. I was free to use my best judgment, but was highly responsible.

We left Santiago in the evening of June 19. With the hope of prize money in my mind's eye, we took the route south of Haiti and up through Mona Passage, but without adding to our own wealth or the wealth of the nation. We arrived off San Juan at 8 A.M. on June 22. The weather was clear and pleasant. As might have been expected, off a weather shore where the trade wind prevails, the wind was fresh and the sea moderately heavy. The sea was nothing to the big St. Paul. We took station in towards the Morro, but outside of gun range. Soon thereafter, smoke was seen arising back of the city ridge, apparently from the harbor. I expressed the belief that the Spanish men-of-war were getting up steam.

The former library of the St. Paul was my mess cabin. Lieutenant S. Nicholson Kane, my aid and signal officer, had been taken into my mess. Kane had been graduated at the head of his class at the Naval Academy, in 1866. He had resigned when an ensign. For many years he was a leading spirit of the New York Yacht Club. He re-entered the navy for the war. At 12:40, while we were at luncheon, we were startled by that ever-hIDEOUS sound, a blast of the siren. That was our emergency signal for manning tiously a short distance to seaward, maneuvered and opened fire at long range, still under the protection of the batteries. Several of her shot probably passed over us on ricochet. One came rather near in that way. The St. Paul replied only by an occasional shot from Lieutenant Poyer's 5-inch gun, but the Isabel continued her ineffective fire. Our had three smokestacks or funnels, one large one between two smaller ones. Plainly she was the Terror and, therefore, very fast. I announced my plan to Lieutenant Kane. I would keep the St. Paul's head up to the wind and sea—about east or parallel to the shore line. That would make her very steady and give us accurate fire. We would steam slowly east, with the object of keeping the Terror on a south bearing, so that she would be obliged to come at us unsteadily, in the trough of the sea. This would draw us away from the Isabel and let us meet the Terror's attack singly. The Isabel was to the westward of the Terror. The plan succeeded quite as intended. The ridge of the city was covered with people interested in the fight. I have since learned that they expected to see us run away. Many thought that the St. Paul would be sunk in any event.

The St. Paul steamed slowly ahead, maintaining that relative bearing. The converging courses of the two vessels drew them closer. At one o'clock the Terror was nearly in range of our 5-inch guns. There she steamed in a circle to get up speed. The St. Paul stopped her engines and waited. Then the Terror made her dash at us, with high speed, firing as she came and rolling deeply. She looked like a knife edge. When she was about 6,000 yards distant, coming on at twenty-two knots, and ready to ring for twenty-seven knots, as I have since learned, I pulled the siren cord and sounded two blasts of the siren. That was our signal to open fire.

The St. Paul seemed to jump at the volume of our fire. Only the three 5-inch guns of the starboard battery could reach home, but the 6-pounder and 3-pounder guns of the same battery were allowed to fire also, in order that they might get in touch with the Terror as she came on. She hardly got in range of the small guns. Although the distance was great, our 5-inch shell were falling rapidly around our enemy and very close to her. The Terror was doing her part well, but suddenly she sheered up into the wind, broadside to the St. Paul. She the guns and going to quarters. We hastened to the bridge. There the officer of the deck, Lieutenant Pattson, pointed out the Isabel coming out—a sister ship of the Don Juan de Austria, sunk at Manila. She flew a surprisingly large flag, but hugged the Morro rather closely. The St. Paul held her position without headway. She lay with her head to the easterly wind and sea. The Isabel steamed caumen would laugh derisively as her shot fell short.

At one o'clock, a new enemy appeared and the fight promised to be more than symptomatic. Dimly visible against the gray background of the Morro was the long, low, snaky form of a destroyer putting to sea. Once outside, she shaped her course northeast, apparently to intercept us, in expectation of a chase. She

NEW YORK CHINESE WANT A CHURCH

An institutional church for the ten thousand Chinese of New York is soon to become an established fact. "The Christian Chinamen need a church and must have it," said the Rev. Dr. George Alexander, of University Place Presbyterian Church, who numbers some hundred of Chinese among his church members. "The Chinese need a place to call their own, where they may concentrate their efforts and prepare themselves to evangelize their own people. They will now have their own church with officials from their own number, and with the Rev. Huie Kin as pastor. He is a man of God, and an honored member of the Presbytery, and a man of rare foresight, who can discern the signs of the times, seeing what China and what the United States should do."

The Mission now located at No. 26 West Ninth Street is the headquarters for many Chinese of New York City and surrounding towns. On Sundays the men begin to gather by noon in the library to read and chat, exchanging friendly gossip and bits of news from home. At 2:30 Sunday School opens, followed by preaching in Chinese at 4 o'clock. Dinner is served at 5 o'clock. An hour later is held a meeting of the Young Men's Christian Association, followed by Bible classes in both English and Chinese, and a song service.

"The days when one lonesome Chinaman sat by his individual Sunday School teacher to learn his A B C's are past and gone," said Mr. Huie. "The Chinamen are pretty well educated now, and they need regular preaching and Sunday School services such as are found in any church. The young men who come to this country to better themselves are not, as is commonly supposed, of the lower classes. Although they are found working in laundries, it is because of their industry, thrift and perseverance that they are working hard while studying to improve themselves. Many a man who has been a teacher even in high school, comes to this country or sends his sons, and while working at some humble trade, is studying with the idea of returning to help in the development of the new China. It is the farmers' sons who come to this country, just as our young men go West or to Australia or to the Philippines."

"Young men of this class return to China to fill government positions and to operate factories and industries after Western methods. One such Chinaman, upon returning to his native country, established a factory for the manufacture of hosiery and underwear, associating with him a number of others of American education. Every Sunday services are held in the factory under the supervision of these young men, who are loyal to the religion of Christ as they learned it in the New World. Others have recently graduated from art and textile schools, and are now studying engineering. They will establish factories upon their return to China."

Mrs. Huie enters sympathetically into the Mission work among the young. All who come are welcomed cordially and entertained hospitably. On Sundays, some forty or fifty men sit down to dinner; sometimes to an American dinner, sometimes to Chinese cooking. Mr. Huie acts not only as preacher, but as lawyer, peacemaker and general adviser. The Mission is affiliated with members in Chicago, St. Louis and Cleveland; also in different places in New Jersey, Arkansas, Montana and Canada. It is doing a work similar to that done by Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations in meeting the varied needs of these homeless strangers. The Mission, however, has outgrown its present quarters. A suitable building has been found with auditorium, gymnasium, shower-baths and dormitories well adapted for the uses of an institutional church. An effort is to be made to raise a fund of $10,000 to purchase the building and put it in order for occupancy this year.

kept firing though her shot fell short. Then I saw a pear-shaped volume of white smoke or vapor stream from her hull, abaft her smokestacks, and remarked that she had probably been hit in her engine room. I was right. She turned at once and steamed for San Juan at about sixteen knots' speed. Her eccentric behavior after that showed that she was damaged. The St. Paul could not follow without drawing the fire of the shore batteries. With them I had no quarrel. Admiral Sampson's attack in force had done them no harm.

The Terror, instead of standing directly into the harbor, fell to leeward, down towards Cabras Island. When well inshore she rounded to and struggled into the inner harbor, evidently out of trim and not properly manageable. The Isabel had shown concern by standing in after her. They disappeared around the point. Later, on the same day, the Isabel and a gunboat came out. They held to the eastward, close to the shore. When I turned the St. Paul towards them, though with no intention of running in, they promptly retired to the harbor. The Terror had two engineers and three men killed and seven men wounded—about one-sixth of her people. Her decks were swept several times by fragments of shell and one 5-inch shell went through her, wrecking her after engine and passing out below the water line. Her steering gear was injured also. In the harbor she was run aground to keep her from sinking. She could not have remained afloat much longer, and was under repairs about one month.

The prompt success of the St. Paul made me very proud of my command. Her efficiency and steadiness reflected much credit on the executive officer, Lieutenant-Commander William H. Driggs. Both officers and men did the shooting. We had on board 26 officers and 500 men. It is hardly conceivable that so many as 100 of our people could have been saved had the Terror succeeded. That was the first attack ever made by the type of vessels known as torpedo boat destroyers. It should have been delivered at night, but I have been told that the captain of the Terror, Commander de la Rocha, acted under orders. The people of the United States had feared the advent of the Spanish destroyers, as against our battleships, especially because we had no destroyers to meet them. My official reports of the fight, which give the names of the officers, are published in the Appendix to the Report of the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, Navy Department, 1898; pages 220 to 222.

Now comes the sad sequel to the story. After the war, Commander de la Rocha was tried by a military or naval court in Spain. The court decided against his conduct of the fight. He was taken ill, lost his mind and died. From all that I saw, I formed the opinion that the Terror was fought with great spirit, so long as there was a chance for success, and that when hope of success was gone, her commander did well to save his crew and vessel for his government. The Ter- ror's condition, on her arrival in port, showed that she would have sunk at sea ultimately—even if the St. Paul had not fired another shot. In her damaged condition the Terror was at least three knots slower than the St. Paul, and getting still slower. Her steering gear was defective. The St. Paul, with her excess of speed, could then have chosen her own position, beyond the range of the Terror's guns and torpedoes, and with her 5-inch guns could have sunk the Terror quickly without risk to herself. The slow Isabel could not have come up in time to interfere, and would, herself, have been outmaneuvered and defeated by the faster St. Paul had she entered into a fight.

The St. Paul let no vessel get into San Juan while blockading, but turned a German steamer away. Only two vessels passed out. These were boarded and examined. One of the latter told us the nature of the Terror's losses and injuries, and virtually as ascertained officially after the war. The blockade was perfectly efficient.

THE DIVINE SHEPHERD-SAVIOUR

HE that entereth not by the door into the sheepfold, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber." The "sheepfold" here referred to was an enclosure made by a high stone wall. The wall was made formidable by being topped with a row of thorns. There was only one door to the sheepfold, so that the shepherd might have a more perfect knowledge of his sheep, as they passed in and out, one by one. The heavenly sheepfold has one door. Jesus himself said, "I am the door." And we are told in Acts 4: 12, "There is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved." Those who try to make an entrance for themselves, by their own names, through their own good deeds, are verily "thieves and robbers."

He that Entereth in by the Door is the Shepherd of the Sheep. The shepherd is not a respecter of sheep.

Dev's some, dey's black and thin,
And some, dey's po' ol' weddas.

Yes, and there are some torn with thorns, and bruised by falling among the rocks, for each one the Shepherd has a kind look at least, a drop of oil for the wounded, a cup of cold water for the weary. And our Shepherd is no respecter of persons; he loved us while we were yet sinners. The church founded by the Good Shepherd should have his spirit. A sexton once ordered from the church a poorly dressed woman who had come in from the street on a week-day, and was kneeling in one of the pews, praying. The incident was related to the pastor, who reproved the sexton. The sexton defended himself by saying: "Why, if we permit it, they will soon be praying all over the place." The pastor, in his reply, showed that he had the right idea of his position, and that of the church. He said: "I want to see an open door and a welcome to all."

The Welcome Shepherd

To Him the Porter Openeth. At night when the flock is safe in the fold, their care is given over to an under-shepherd, who is the "porter." In the morning when the shepherd comes, the porter hastens from within to open the door. Each one of us may be said to be a "porter." And when the Good Shepherd comes to us seeking entrance, we should be ready to open the spiritual door of our hearts. A critic spoke to Holman Hunt about his picture of Christ standing at the door and knocking. "The door has no handle," he said. "Ah, that is not a mistake," replied the artist, "the handle is inside. It is from within that the door must be opened to Christ standing without."

He Calleth His Own Sheep by Name. It is said that Oriental shepherds often give names to their sheep descriptive of some trait or characteristic of the animal, and the sheep learn their names and will come at the call of the shepherd. By what names shall the Good Shepherd call us? We are told in Rev. 3: 12 that he will give us new names which he will write upon us, even in our foreheads (Rev. 22: 4.) "What shall be my angel name?"

He Goeth Before Them and the Sheep Follow Him, and thus it is that the Oriental shepherd has no dogs to drive his sheep as the Western shepherd has. Let us be followers of God and his Christ, impelled only by the love we bear him. He draws us, and we follow on.

A Stranger will They Not Follow. Each Oriental shepherd has his own peculiar call, and it comes to be well known by his sheep. When he calls, they cease their nibbling, lift their heads and are attent; but not so when a stranger calls, instead of following they scatter. In Eph. 4: 14, Christians are warned against the strange calls of every wind of doctrine, and of the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness whereby they lie in wait to deceive. Two ladies left their homes in a Christian land, that they might sit at the feet of a Babist teacher in far-away Syria. Others have listened to the "wind of doctrine," as it is to be found in Theosophy, Christian Science and other cults. Are men and women less wise than sheep?

Pillars in the Church

This Parable Spake Jesus Unto Them. He was giving these Pharisees a New Testament version of the twenty-third Psalm. They "understood not," because they would not. Their minds were filled with prejudice and pride, and their hearts were hard. Hear a modern parable: "Once there was a church which had two kinds of pillars. One was of wood covered with stucco, very large and ornamental; the other kind was all solid granite, very plain. One day a flood undermined the church, and one of the pillars fell. When the architect heard of it he quietly asked what kind of pillar had fallen, and when he learned it was a large and very prominent one, he replied, 'That will make no difference. Those pillars support only themselves; the modest granite pillars support the roof.'"

All that Ever Came Before me are Thieves and Robbers. It was the Jewish leaders that in this story Jesus called "thieves and robbers." It was these same men at whom he hurled the sevenfold lightning of his "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites, covetous."

* International Sunday School Lesson for April 5, 1908. John 10: 1-11. GOLDEN TEXT: "The Good Shepherd giveth his life for the sheep." John 10: 11.

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

We hear too much of the patience and gentleness of Christ, but too little of his courage and severity, which must be included in any true following "in his steps." When it is needed we must be ready to rebuke wickedness, both in high places and low, being always careful to avoid Pharisaism and the spirit of criticism which makes a man a pest in any society. The self-righteous people, who are continually looking for faults in other people, do more harm than good, and make religion hateful even to religious people.

The Door of the Fold

By Me if any Man Enter in, he Shall be Saved. I had a dream in which I seemed to be standing looking through a high fence and seeing heaven and its joys inside. There were throngs of happy and blest men in my sight, but no one seemed to see me. I was almost at the point of sobbing in my disappointment and loneliness, when a beautiful angel came toward me, and in sweetest tones said: "Will you not come in? You are very welcome," and then opened the gate for me, and when I was inside, the angel's arm held me in tender embrace about my waist, as we walked together toward the groups of the beatified. We have Jesus' word for it that "any may enter in."

"And go after the sheep that was lost till he find it"

And Find Pasture. It is the promise that we shall find it soul-satisfying to take Jesus for our Shepherd-Saviour. Jesus said, "I am come that they might have life." "In every circle or community where you have ever lived has there not been some man whom you knew as the life-giver? He quickened languid natures. He made the streams run full. He called the dead to life." But Jesus is the true Life given to every one; to every community.

Nibbling Astray

The Good Shepherd Giveth His Life for His Sheep. Jesus was looking forward to the cross, where he should pay the purchase price for his sheep with the red coin of his own blood. "Ye are bought with a price, therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's" (I. Cor. 6: 20). A traveler once said: "I have often been wandering over the Scotch hills away from haunts of men, but I have always found one man there—the shepherd. So we ought always to have our Shepherd with us. Some say he is up in heaven. He is no good to me, if I cannot always have him near. Bring him down."

Nibbling Ourselves Astray. This is a phrase from Jowett, of Birmingham. Timely figure! We do not stray from the flock intentionally. We simply get our heads down to the ground in business or pleasure, absorbed in the detail before us, and ere we are aware we have nibbled ourselves from the path and the flock and the safety of the Shepherd's shielding care. Be careful about this matter of absorption in the nibbling process, which results in the loss of the sense of direction and the appreciation of distance. We dabble too much, taking a nibble here and tarrying for a moment there, until we are in the place of peril without knowing it. Take care of the little things! They fix direction and plow the furrow of habit. Do not nibble your self astray.

The sun was setting over the hills around the little town of Nazareth, when a traveler stopped to rest and to gaze down upon the valley beneath him. Far away in the distance his eye caught a certain object, which seemed to be moving nearer and nearer. By and by he saw distinctly that it was a shepherd leading home his flock of sheep for their night's rest. Darkness would soon fall, and the traveler knew that the hour was late but he lingered, fascinated by the sight in the valley below. He could see at the foot of the hill a little building evidently intended for a sheepfold. "But it is very strange," thought he: "the sheep certainly rested there last night, for I can see straw scattered about on the ground; the walls are strong and thick, but—there is no door. So the place is absolutely useless as a protection against thieves and wild beasts."

The Living Door

All this time the shepherd was going quietly on with his work. Now he had reached the fold, and one by one the sheep entered until they were all safely inside. "It is very late," said the traveler to himself, "but I cannot leave until I see what the shepherd means to do for the protection of his sheep." The man was busy now providing them with food for their evening meal, and soon the sheep all settled down to feed and rest for the night. Then the shepherd brought out his own food. Taking his provisions with him, he seated himself in the very middle of the opening, where there was no door.

His meal finished, he laid his shepherd's crook beside him, wrapped his cloak around him, and lay down across the open space to rest. He himself was the door, and no harm or danger could come to the sheep during those long night watches, without first passing over the shepherd's body. Is not this a wonderful picture of what our Lord Jesus Christ meant when he said: "I am the door; by me if any man enter in he shall go in and out and find pasture."

The Lamb's Mother. "Do you know where Farmer Taylor is?" asked a clergyman of a man in a wagon on the hill. I see'd him five minutes ago down there amongst the sheep," answered the man. "This snow is making him a bit anxious about the lambs." When the clergyman turned into a lane, he came on a picturesque scene. The newly fallen snow was sparkling in the sunshine, and over it tramped the kindly farmer. Several sheep and lambs were with him, and his faithful dog Jack, active and alert, kept a sharp eye on both master and flock. The smallest lamb was in its owner's arms, and close by his side trotted a sheep. Mr. Mason told his errand, then noticing how this sheep kept rubbing against the farmer's legs and bleating in a kind of quiet satisfaction, he said: "I suppose this is the mother of the lamb. I never saw such an intelligent sheep before. Is she showing her satisfaction at your carrying the lamb?" "Well, there's a bit of that in it," answered Joseph Taylor, in his slow North country dialect. "But that dumb thing just loves to be with me; you see she was a pair bit of a creature when she was young, and we brought her up in the house. She followed us about like a dog, and we had no end of trouble to make her take to the fields later on." "She loves you still, that's clear," said Mr. Mason, as he watched the sheep pushing her head into his hand. "Ay, ay, loves me, that's the word," said Joseph, "and she loves me because she knows me. See how she trusts me with her lamb, and no one else is allowed to touch it, if she can help. A while back she broke her leg jumping that wall to get round to me, because she heard me talking in the barn. She let me set it without once moving, and licked my hands when I was done. You may smile, but I fairly love her." "I don't wonder," said Mr. Mason. "As you were speaking, I thought that your words made a beautiful parable." "I know," said the farmer, his dark eyes twinkling. "That poor beast has taught me several things. It has made me understand our Lord's words, 'My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me,' in quite a fresh light."

AROUND THE HOME HEARTH

About Holding One's Own

By Margaret E. Sangster

No Tyranny in the Home

WE are all familiar with the phrase "holding one's own," as it is applied to patients who are very ill. The doctor comes in several times a day, the house is hushed and silent, and everything focuses in the sick-room, where some one—man, woman or child—is fighting for life. Inquirers at the door hear that the dear one is holding his own, and go away thankful for that much of comfort. The scale may turn for the better in a few hours; hope is not abandoned yet; the strife may be against odds, but there is still a chance for recovery.

There are other forms of illness, shall we say, or, perhaps, of an equal loss of poise, in which it is worth while to make a hard struggle to hold one's own. How many of us, for example, left school years ago with a brilliant record and a fair equipment for going on intellectually! We meant then to keep on with study, to add to our reading, and to devote at least a little time every day to the work and the text books over which we had spent years of happy toil. But everybody knows what a difficult task it is to study alone, without the incentive of emulation and the spur of a schedule. The thing that may be done at any time is frequently not done at all. The thing that was done with ease and delight in a classroom under a competent teacher falls flat and seems tedious when done at home amid constant trivial interruptions. The girl graduate, for it is to her especially that this talk is addressed, to her, to her elder sister and her mother, soon discovers that other claims interfere seriously with her efforts for mental improvement. Very likely she ceases to read, except in a desultory fashion, or she marries and has babies, or keeps house, rises early, sits up late, and almost imperceptibly changes into a very different woman from the woman she expected to be in her school days. Fifteen or twenty years after she leaves school she has parted with a good deal of mental alertness, and feels herself hopelessly left behind when talking with those who have had wider opportunities and a more varied life than hers. She has not held her own and is disheartened. How shall she remedy the evil? What can she do to keep step with her children? The question is being asked every day by hundreds of anxious women.

A practical plan of action requiring an exercise of will power and a sacrifice of vanity, is to sit down every evening and partake in the home work of the children at school. On the whole, it is surprising how much the children are taught in these days, and how far-reaching and suggestive are the questions they are asked and expected to answer. Simply to sit down and study with the children, beginning perhaps at their beginning, and proceeding as they proceed, will brighten the wits of a mother who has forgotten what she learned in her youth. Presently she will find out that memory is not so untrustworthy as she supposed, and that the layers that have hidden its treasures are one by one drifting away.

A college graduate who saw on her return from her Alma Mater that her mother was grieving because she had been surpassed by her clever daughter, decided on her part an equally excellent plan. She persuaded her mother to take up with her a study in science and some work in English literature. Each morning from half-past ten until half-past eleven the two sat together hard at work, thus gaining for each study three hours a week. In the evening the family gathered around the lamp, listened to entertaining reading, and the mother soon found that she was holding her own and gaining a new grasp of what had been, as she fancied, lost forever.

In the matter of accomplishments, especially in the department of music, where daily practice is requisite if one would not entirely lose technique, the great majority of women heedlessly let slip from them all for which they strove with incessant labor in the days of their girlhood. Yet ten minutes a day devoted to finger exercises and scales, and fifteen minutes now and then given to memorizing, to reviewing old favorites or acquiring new ones, would keep a woman in touch with her juniors throughout her life. This would not be enough to enable her to remain a finished artist, music being the most exacting and jealous study in the world. It would, however, enable her to hold her own. Among the readers of this page are women in the later fifties, the sixties and the seventies who have never entirely given up piano practice, and who continue to find pleasure for themselves, and to give pleasure to their families by the music at the finger tips.

The determination never to let a day pass when one is in fair health without doing some little thing outside of and beyond the daily grind, will go far to keep the mind fresh and to rob life of the dread of ennui. There may be a great pile of stockings waiting to be darned; Johnnie's trousers may need patching and Elizabeth may have torn her only decent school frock in climbing a fence. Don't make the patching too artistic, and if the darning has not the fine finish that your grandmother would have given it, never mind. The important and necessary thing for the house mother and her children is that the mother shall hold her own in all-around development. Once it has been decided what the essentials are everything will become easy.

The Upper Side

When the clouds are low, and the winds are wild,
And the world forgets that it ever smiled,
Have thou no fear, for above the cloud,
And above the realm where the winds are loud,
Light, and glory, and joy abide;
There is always light on the upper side.

LETTER lately received by the editor of this page tells a mournful story of a life practically wrecked because of a wrong start in the home. This friend has reached middle life, and declares that she has never as yet had a fair chance, but has been continually misunderstood, badgered and criticised from four to forty. So far back as she can remember she has been subjected to fault-finding, being as a small child obliged to wait upon and mind the older children. As a young girl, having never received sympathy at school or at home, and in her married life quite naturally having failed to take her rightful place as mistress of the household, she is now the victim of a morbid despondency. Very likely ill-health has had a good deal to do with her constant lack of confidence in herself and inability to hold her own. But the natural outcome of petty tyranny exercised upon children is to confirm them in undue sensitiveness and to make them hesitating and timid in after life.

To one who has drifted into the position of this correspondent sermons are not of the slightest use. She needs a little more sunshine. If she could have an outing and get away from her present routine that would help her, and so would a new dress or two, a new hat and a little money to spend according to her pleasure, without any one's interference. There are times in life when, strange as it seems, an interest in dress and the ability to freshen her wardrobe do far more for a woman than pills and potions.

In training children, mothers should keep before them an ideal of justice. No tyranny in the household to-day, if there is to be symmetrical development and happiness to-morrow.

Hundreds of women reading this advice will express a wonder whether the writer has forgotten that a hard struggle with poverty and incessant anxiety about the price of coal and meat make new dresses and hats and excursions for pleasure an impossibility in their case. They may say as well advise a trip to Europe or a journey around the world as a cure for melancholy, as to counsel independent spending money when the case is that of a wife married to a very poor man. Undoubtedly the exception is well taken, but suppose instead of dresses and bonnets, jaunts and outings we substitute a plant in the window, a few flowers in the yard, a visit to an old schoolmate a few doors away, and every day an hour's rest in the afternoon. When sickness prostrates a woman and she takes to her bed, she is compelled to rest. Many a woman far too soon lays down life's burden and rests beneath the sod. If husbands were oftener asked to lend a hand with the harder portions of the housework, few of them would refuse the assistance of their stronger arms. A man may handle a washing machine fully as well as his wife can do, and churning is as easy for him as for her. There are of course churls and misers, but, thank heaven, they are not the rule among American men, the great majority of whom are chivalrous and tender and would help along when domestic crises come if only they knew how, and their wives would permit them to give a little aid. A woman should not say, "I toil and toil beyond my strength, and I will not request my husband to help me, although I think he would not refuse if he were only asked."

How is the man to know that his help would not be regarded as obtrusive, if this is the attitude of his life partner?

I Love to Be with Jesus

I LOVE to be with Jesus,
He understands me so,
And bids me lean upon him
Wherever I must go.
I tell him freely, fully,
The things that trouble me;
For he will help me bear them,
Or make them all to flee.

If I have failed to please him,
I come to his dear feet,
With penitential sorrow
The story to repeat.
He does not frown upon me,
He does not spurn me then,
But in his great compassion,
He bids me try again.

I love to be with Jesus,
He is so kind and true;
And when things are perplexing,
He tells me what to do.
A "present help in trouble,"
I always can depend
On him to lead me safely,
My tried and trusted Friend.

When I am stunned by sorrow,
When heart and hand are numb,
'Tis only Christ can help me,
And so to him I come.
He folds me to his bosom,
He blends his tears with mine,
And breathes his blessed comfort,
His love, his peace divine.

Evangelist Hilton Dead

MAJOR HILTON, long and favorably known as an evangelist and Christian worker, is dead. He was taken with heart failure during some meetings in Los Angeles recently. The Major was a man of very strong personality, and for twenty-five years or more he lived a life of unselfishness, devoting his time and talents in an endeavor to slay sin and uplift Christ.

Major Hilton was born in New York City in 1836. He was educated for a business career; but when the Civil War broke out he followed the example of thousands of other young men and enlisted as a volunteer, his regiment being the Twelfth New York. He rose to the rank of adjutant and then to major, and was among the Union forces which surrendered at Harper's Ferry in 1862. After the war he re-entered business, but some time later was appointed to a clerkship in the Internal Revenue Department, Washington, D. C., which he held for ten years with credit. He was a lover of society and was esteemed a "good fellow" among the young men of the capital; but at that time he had no special religious convictions.

In January, 1880, he was converted, and soon afterward began Christian work as a laborer in the spiritual vineyard. His work led him among the prisoners in the Washington jails and among railroad men, and he exerted a wonderful influence wherever he went. In 1884, he was associated with several other gentlemen in the organization of the Central Union Mission on Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, a mission which has been the means of reaching multitudes throughout the country, through the labors of its evangelists and also through a weekly publication issued by the mission. Under its auspices, from thirty to thirty-five Gospel meetings were held from week to week, and it soon had a corps of over a hundred Christian workers in the different churches and denominations.

But Major Hilton was not satisfied with local evangelistic work. He resigned his lucrative post under the government and went forth to preach the Gospel throughout the land. This was in 1884, and from that time until the day of his death he continued in evangelistic work, conducting meetings in almost every State of the Union and being wonderfully blessed in spiritual results. For nearly a quarter of a century he has been one of the best known lay evangelists in America. He invariably brought to his work an earnestness that compelled immediate attention, a faith so strong that it overleaped all obstacles, and a simple, straightforward eloquence that won all hearts. His presentation of Gospel truth was convincing, and it can be said of him that he was one of those "who brought many to righteousness."

The government has decided to throw open the American National Red Cross to general membership, and already applications for enrolment are pouring in. Under the plan, every good American citizen—man, woman or child—is eligible to membership. On application to Edward R. Johnstone, National Registrar of the Red Cross, 341, War Department, Army and Navy Building, Washington, D. C., the applicant's name will be enrolled, a badge of membership forwarded, and the Red Cross Bulletin will be sent regularly for one year. Every candidate should forward one dollar with application, to cover enrolment fee and necessary expenses.

HAPPY OLD AGE
Most Likely to Follow Proper Eating

As old age advances, we require less food to replace waste, and food that will not overtax the digestive organs, while supplying due nourishment.

Such an ideal food is found in Grape-Nuts, made of whole wheat and barley by long baking and action of diastase in the barley which changes the starch into sugar.

The phosphates also, placed up under the bran-coat of the wheat, are included in Grape-Nuts, but left out of white flour. They are necessary to the building of brain and nerve cells.

"I have used Grape-Nuts," writes an Iowa man, "for 8 years and feel as good and am stronger than I was ten years ago. I am over 74 years old and attend to my business every day."

"Among my customers I meet a man every day who is 92 years old and attributes his good health to the use of Grape-Nuts and Postum which he has used for the last 5 years. He mixes Grape-Nuts with Postum and says they go fine together."

"For many years before I began to eat Grape-Nuts, I could not say that I enjoyed life or knew what it was to be able to say I am well." I suffered greatly with constipation, now my habits are as regular as ever in my life.

Whenever I make extra effort I depend on Grape-Nuts food and it just fills the bill. I can think and write a great deal easier."

Nature and Providence*

IN these spring days, a man must be very unthoughtful, that is not impressed by the old but ever new miracle of the reviving life all around him. We speak of nature being so abounding in her wealth of life, when we see the trees putting forth their shoots and the plants breaking into fresh green, but it is really God that we mean. Nature is only his garment. The old Pantheists who saw God in everything taught a more reasonable philosophy than the modern materialists who regard the world as dead matter, renewing its vitality mechanically by some law of its being. The more thoroughly the world of trees and flowers and birds and beasts is examined, the more clear do the evidences of design and continued care become. Evolution does not account for the remarkable beauty, or for the extraordinary fertility of this prolific natural world. The tiniest butterfly living but its one day of glorious life, has a robe of exquisite beauty, that becomes more lovely under the microscope, that reveals the defects of our own work. Our looms and palettes confess their failure as they are compared with the texture and hues of the moth's wing or the most insignificant flower. And as we learn the habits and formations of these common objects, we discover evidences of design and adaptation to purpose more wonderful than artistic skill. One who has regarded nature as mere matter dead and insensible has only to study and he will exclaim, "Surely God is here and I knew it not."

Is it probable that all this care and thoughtfulness which God lavishes on the world of nature ceases when he deals with humanity? Is it not a fair inference, that the same God that provides so bountifully for the insects, birds and flowers will show still more wisdom and love in providing for the race which is the chief and crown of all? True he does not pour out his provision indiscriminately, without regard to human effort, nor does he interfere to save the wrongdoer from the natural consequences of his misconduct. To do that would have been to develop a race of dependent children, not of men. He expects us to struggle, to strive, to labor, but for those who do, he makes bountiful provision. The trickster sometimes succeeds in taking another's share and keeping the reward from the laborer, but that is the fault of our system which will be remedied in a happier condition. There is no limit in the provision God makes for his creatures.

Who Are Eligible?*

NO knowledge could be conceived more important than this of the conditions of acceptance with God. Men in all ages and in every land have striven to learn what they must do to win the divine favor. To this day men may be seen in India whose bodies are contorted by the long disuse of some member—men whose arms have become rigid by being held upright night and day through long years, men whose bodies have been torn by hooks and otherwise tortured. Others in Mohammedan lands have undertaken long and painful pilgrimages with the same object of winning the divine favor. The history of Catholicism, too, teems with narratives of self-inflicted suffering and of the penances of the saints. We speak strongly of the wickedness of the human race, but the fact cannot be denied that there have been multitudes of proofs that men have been willing to undergo suffering and make extraordinary effort to render themselves acceptable to God. When, therefore, the Psalmist undertakes to declare the conditions of obtaining the divine favor he answers a universal longing of the human race.

The announcement is all the more interesting because of its simplicity. If it had been a matter of money, and the Psalmist had declared that only those who could give a certain sum would be accepted of God, the poor would have taken no further interest, perceiving themselves excluded. Had it been that only persons of aristocratic birth, sons and daughters of the Revolution, or persons of influence, were eligible, the obscure would have abandoned hope. Or if it had been that persons of learning or culture alone would be received, the ignorant and unrefined must have been out of the race. But it is none of these things. The Psalmist says that he that is worthy to ascend into the hill of the Lord, is "he that hath clean hands and a pure heart." After all, then, it is not a question of rank or class or possessions, or even of attainment, but a question of character. The poor and the ignorant have the same chance as the rich and cultured.

The time came when the Psalmist learned the need of a still further concession. After his dreadful sin, he could not hope to be received as a man of clean hands. Like so many of us, he had shut himself out of the ranks of the sinless. But even then he did not lose hope. He cried, "a broken and a contrite heart thou wilt not despise!" and rejoiced in his acceptance.

An Ex-Governor on the Motto

EX-GOVERNOR L. BRADFORD PRINCE, of New Mexico, in a letter published in the New York Tribune, thus explains the meaning of the motto, "In God We Trust," which the people are now demanding to be restored to the national coinage:

"In the voluminous correspondence which the proposed discontinuance of the words, 'In God We Trust' has called forth I have not seen any mention of the point which to me is the important and controlling one. I refer to the ingratitude involved in discarding the words at this time; ingratitude to God for past protection and blessings, and a virtual assumption that the nation is now so strong that it is independent of any heavenly aid. To those who remember the circumstances under which the words were placed upon our coins this ingratitude seems not only self-sufficient and arrogant but despicable."

"The nation's life was in direct danger. No graver crisis ever confronted a people. Many disappointments and disasters had weakened self-confidence till at last, strong in the sense of right, but humbled by delay and defeat, the national feeling took form in the brief expression from the very souls of the people, 'In God We Trust.' It was not simply a creed, an expression of their belief; it was a prayer. It was an acknowledgment that only by God's blessing on the justice of our cause was victory to be assured, and it was an appeal to the Majesty of High Heaven to aid the right."

"The God in whom we trusted gave us victory and peace and union. And now, when we have grown strong, when we boast of being a world-power, when we depend on great ships and vast armaments, when, in short, we have outgrown fear and believe that we can depend on the strength of our own arm, we are called on to be ingrates, to forget the debt of gratitude due to the Almighty in the day of trial, and to announce our self-sufficiency in the face of men and angels of erasing the words which were at once a declaration of faith and a prayer for protection, and practically asserting that we are no longer dependent on the power and the mercy of God, but will depend on our own strength and wealth."

"History, sacred and profane, is full of such examples from the days of Babel down, and the sequels of them all have been additional proofs that 'pride goeth before a fall.'"

GROWING STRONGER

Apparently, with Advancing Age.

"In 1896, at the age of fifty years, I collapsed from excessive coffee drinking," writes a man in Missouri. "For four years I shambled about with the aid of crutches or cane, most of the time unable to dress myself without help."

"My feet were greatly swollen, my right arm was shrunken and twisted inward, the fingers of my right hand were clenched and could not be extended except with great effort and pain. Nothing seemed to give me more than temporary relief."

"Now, during all this time and for about thirty years previously, I drank daily an average of six cups of strong coffee—rarely missing a meal."

"My wife at last took my case into her own hands and bought some Postum. She made it according to directions and I liked it fully as well as the best high grade coffee."

"Improvement set in at once. In about six months I began to work a little, and in less than a year I was very much better, improving rapidly from day to day. I am now in far better health than most men of my age and apparently growing stronger with advancing age."

"I am busy every day at some kind of work and am able to keep up with the procession without a cane. The arm and hand that were once almost useless, now keep far ahead in rapidity of movement and beauty of penmanship."

people showed an intelligent interest, that might have put to the blush many an Eastern community.

At six, a picnic supper was served. The other families had brought well-filled lunch baskets. Mrs. Brown served tea and coffee and supplied whatever might be lacking to give the men a real "home treat," which helped to make Sunday afternoon the brightest spot in their week. After supper, those who chose to do so, left. Nobody wished to go before.

Howard, greatly entertained and interested, had really enjoyed the day; but at evening he slipped away by himself. The mountains seemed to have suddenly closed in around him, like prison walls, and he stood sadly gazing toward the east and thinking of that last service in the home church and the tragedy that followed. There rose before him a vision of his friend lying in the grave, a week dead. With a groan and shudder, he sank upon a stone and covered his face with his hands, to shut out the sight.

Had his vision but been long enough, he might have seen John at that very moment (half-past seven in Montana being half-past nine in New York) bidding Howard's sister good-night at her door, having escorted her home from church. "Have you heard from Howard?" John asked as they were parting.

"No," she sadly answered. "He never stayed away like this."

"Do not worry, I think he will soon come home," said John, and softly pressed her hand as he left her.

For some reason she could not have explained, she felt cheered and comforted; but John walked slowly home—troubled in heart, and from that hour strove to fill, in such small measure as he might, the place of his absent friend in the bereaved household.

There was a touch on Howard's arm, and he started up to see Anna standing by him. Shocked by the misery of his face, she stammered:

"Excuse me; I spoke your name three times without your hearing. We are going to sing again. Mother sent me to ask you to help."

Quickly pulling himself together he followed her to the house. Later she reported to her parents:

"His name is not Small. He does not know it when you speak it. I spoke to him three times, and then touched his arm; and when he looked up, his face was just awful. It gave me the creeps."

"What did it look like?" asked Carrie.

"Oh, I can't tell you. Like Lady Macbeth's when she said, 'What, will these hands ne'er be clean?'"

"You ridiculous child!" said her mother. "Ever since you took part in that play at the high school in Helena, you have had Lady Macbeth on the brain. Probably the poor boy is homesick."

"I think he is under an assumed name," said Mr. Brown. "Very likely he was traveling on a scalper's ticket and had to use the name on the train and now doesn't know how to get out of it. That may be all that worries him. Don't you girls go to making a tragedy hero of him. That is too silly."

But Anna, who had seen the look, was of the same opinion still. Her mother changed the subject by saying:

"He has a beautiful Bible and he knows how to use it. Did you see how he turned it over in Bible class for references? I found him in the sitting-room this morning, working at the lesson with his Bible and the Sunday School Times like a good fellow. I noticed the book and he said his mother gave it to him on his last birthday. We need not suspect a boy with his mother's Bible in his pocket of an heinous crime, even if he did leave his overcoat home."

CHAPTER IV

THERE was certainly nothing of the hero of tragedy in Howard's appearance as he started cheerily out, dressed in a ranchman's suit, to begin on the fences. He knew little of wire-stretching and post-setting; but that was easily learned, and his knowledge of surveying was useful in straightening lines and determining angles. He went at his work with energy, and Mr. Brown soon decided that he was good help. The other men liked him. The women found him always courteous and thoughtful—"a real mother's boy," Mrs. Brown said.

Their gratitude was especially won by his planning a pipe line to bring to the house hot water from a boiling spring on a nearby hill. All through that section of country, such springs are frequent; for, as in the Yellowstone Park, the surface lies near to the internal heat of the earth.

The bracing air and exercise brought color to Howard's cheeks and a sparkle to his eyes. The days were too busy for brooding, and at night he was tired enough to sleep. Still, he did much earnest thinking, and decided that at any risk, S. S. Small must be found and paid for his ticket. Reparation was possible and must be made, though he fully realized that it might give a clue to the detectives that would send him to the electric chair or life imprisonment, and bring shame and sorrow to his mother and sister. He also decided that it was wiser to take Mr. Brown into his confidence as far as necessary and get him to make inquiries, than to leave his present retreat to make the search.

When he had been at the ranch about a month, Mr. Brown was going away on one of his frequent business trips. The afternoon before he was to start, they went together to measure the ground for the pipe for the hot water. At the top of the hill they sat down to rest and talk.

"Let me know when you want some money, Seth," said Mr. Brown. "Do you prefer to be paid by the month, or how?"

Prohibition in Missouri

SEVENTY counties in Missouri have voted for Prohibition within the last six months, but in none of them has there been a fiercer fight than in Ray County, of which Richmond is the county seat. The women of Richmond organized a Prohibition league and to them is given credit for reforming this county, where thousands of coal miners and illiterate foreigners reside, who demanded open saloons.

The campaign planned by the women of Richmond was launched a few days prior to the date of the local option election, by means of a system of "follow-up" letters. These letters were original and three were sent to each voter in the county. They arrived in consecutive mails, one reaching the voter the day preceding election. Then a campaign of prayer began. The last letter mailed by the women was an appeal to the men of the county to vote out of existence a traffic which they represented as bringing to the community hunger, suffering, sorrow, crime and death. It said:

Vote for your boys, your girls, your sister, your brother, your wife, your neighbor, and for your self, your country and your God. The licensed saloon can't buy a light that the citizen can walk by and it brings no business except suffering and death. The man who votes for saloons votes all these into his home. We appeal to you not only that you vote right, but that you use your influence to help drain Richmond of this dangerous traffic. Have you a boy or a loved one to give to the saloon when you vote? Remember this when casting your ballot. We cordially invite you to enjoy our hot coffee and sandwiches at the polls in your precinct on election day.

Then the most appealing argument of all was used. It was the five o'clock morning prayer in the streets. The last of these meetings were held in a driving sleet and snowstorm. Then came election morning. The women called to their assistance five hundred schoolgirls and boys and paraded the city throughout the day. Early on election day a saloonist cleared his bar and fixtures and invited the women to take their luncheon in his place. The women talked to the voters earnestly. As soon as a man gave his promise to vote against the saloon he was decorated with a white ribbon. The women also organized a drum corps and went through the streets playing sacred music.

FARM AND GARDEN

Burpee's Farm Annual for 1908 well fulfils its claim that "it tells the plain truth about the seeds that grow." Buying seeds is usually a lottery. No one can tell from examination of the seeds whether they have been carefully saved from choice pedigree stocks, or produced cheaply to sell wholesale at low prices. On the famous Fordhook Farms in Pennsylvania and Sunnybrook Farm in New Jersey, Mr. Burpee conducts the largest and most complete trial grounds. The number of field trials average about seven thousand, while more than fourteen thousand soil tests for vitality are also made every year. Burpee's seeds are grown either on these farms or produced from extra selected strains, from such sections of America and Europe as have proved best suited to the finest development of the various vegetables, flowers and grains. Fordhook is famous for the variety and quality of its floral products. Its nasturtiums, its sweetpeas, its roses, its stately dahlias—including the famous "Roosevelt dahlia," unequalled in its class—are the delight of flower lovers. In garden seeds the variety and quality are also of the highest and the satisfaction of buyers is evidenced in the fact that their numbers increase every year. No other American seedsmen spend so much time or money either in testing seeds or traveling to examine contract crops. Burpee's seeds are standard, and in this 176-page catalogue, illustrated in black and white and colors, every taste will be gratified. It meets all the requirements of the garden, lawn, orchard and farm. Published by W. Atlee Burpee & Co., Philadelphia, Pa.

L. V. O. B., New York. "Each week I read the Answered Prayer column, and wish to see my name there as a witness to God's mercy and loving kindness. My heart is filled with a peace the world could never give."

E. W. W., Illinois. "I am one of the many thousands who, over two months ago, found themselves suddenly out of work. Guidance and Providence

By Mrs. M. Baxter

MORE than a thousand years before Christ declared himself the good shepherd, God had said the same thing to the heart of David, and the sacred Psalmist, from the fulness of his heart, choiced back the words, "The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want" (Ps. 23: 1). Few there were in David's time who entered more fully into this relationship of God than he, and few there are still, whose freedom from all the burdens which try others, and whose constant confidence in God says, "The Lord has undertaken for me; I shall not, do not, cannot, know want in any respect whatever."

The sheep is the most helpless and most defenseless of all animals, therefore the shepherd must do everything for it. It is not adventurous enough to find pasture for itself; therefore the Good Shepherd says, "I will feed my flock." The sheep cannot find their way alone; therefore he says, "I will seek that which was lost, and bring again that which was riven away, and will bind up that which was broken, and will strengthen that which was sick" (Ezek. 34: 15, 16).

Our blessed Lord spoke his parable of the Good Shepherd to the Pharisees who were offended with him because he had healed the man born blind, and because he had done so on the Sabbath Day. They were, professedly, the shepherds, or leaders, of the people, but the diseased and they not strengthened, nor healed that which was sick, nor bound up that which was broken, nor brought again that which was driven away, nor sought that which was lost (Ezek. 34: 4); and when a poor man, blind from his birth, was healed in their very sight, instead of rejoicing and congratulating him, they persecuted him. Theirs was no true shepherding.

Jesus said to them, "Verily, I say unto you, he that entereth not by the door into the sheepfold, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber." There is but one Shepherd of Christ's sheep. To approach them in any other way than through Jesus, in his name, in his authority, in his Spirit, is seriously to wrong him and his sheep too.

"But he that entereth in by the door is the Shepherd of the sheep." Can Jesus enter by himself? Yes, truly; "By his own blood he entered in once into the holy place" (Heb. 9: 12). The under-shepherds enter only by him. They are not mentioned in the parable—why should they be? Only as they are one with Christ, only as they manifest him, can they feed the flock; their office is to lead to him. "To him the porter openeth; and the sheep hear his voice; and he calleth his own sheep by name, and he leadeth them out." An Eastern shepherd guides by his voice, whether by night or by day; it is essential, therefore, that his sheep shall know their Shepherd's voice. Perhaps the greatest mistakes which we make about guidance arise from a doubt about the Shepherd's voice. How may I always know whether it is the Lord's voice which speaks? His voice always calls us to follow him. "When he putteth forth his own sheep, he goeth before them, and the sheep follow him; for they know his voice." His voice speaks his presence just at hand, just on before, making the way plain for his sheep. His voice makes it perfectly easy to follow him. When, therefore, a suggestion arises to do some impossible, impracticable thing, with an awful sense of condemnation which clouds out Jesus from our view, if we do not do it—we may be sure that this voice is not his.

The true sheep of Jesus will not follow a stranger; "they will flee from him, for they know not the voice of strangers." Nothing fills our hearts fuller of joy and praise than to know certainly the mind and will of God, and to have the presence of Jesus with us in doing his will. When, therefore, an impression which arises in our minds fills us with perplexity, it is either because, for some reason, we are not willing to do the will of God, and are kicking against that which he shows us, or it is because Satan is deceiving us and attempting to break our rest in the Lord by imitating the voice of Jesus, and so misleading us.

Annual Offer of Beautiful Ever-Blooming Roses

A Rare and Liberal Offer of Six Beautiful New Roses, including one of the most beautiful roses in existence—the Royal Kaiserin Augusta Victoria. All handsome, well-rooted, hardy plants. Last year's offer was accepted by thousands and all were delighted. Your Homes and Gardens made more beautiful and fragrant than ever at no expense.

A small sum secures a wealth of Beauty and Fragrance which will last for months. The Rose is the most Popular Flower, and every family should grow them in profusion. This is the finest collection of Roses ever offered. We give brief descriptions as follows:

KAISERIN AUGUSTA VICTORIA.—This beautiful Rose has not only a royal name, but is a royal Rose as well. We have elegant white Roses that have elegant buds, but when full blown are not all that is desired. Then again we have white Roses that are elegant when full blown, but have poor buds. This Rose combines both these good qualities. It is a continuous bloomer, producing successive crops of buds, and formed with large petals of best substance; shows no center when fully opened; color pure creamy white. It far surpasses any other white Rose in all particulars, and has a much richer perfume.

HERMOSA (the old Favorite).—It is hardy as an oak, and always covered with its clear pink blooms; there is not a shade or color of any kind to mar its purity. No Rose will give more general satisfaction.

MAMAN COCHET.—One of the best new Roses. The growth is vigorous, with rich, healthy foliage. The extra large flowers are produced on long stems, are very double, and the buds and half-expanded flowers are simply exquisite in their graceful form, delicate color and rich fragrance. The color is deep rose-pink, the inner side of the petals silvery-gray.

STAR OF LYON.—This magnificent Tea Rose is a rich golden yellow, a strong, healthy and vigorous grower; immense bloomer, bearing flowers and buds early and late. The flowers are very deep, rich and full, excellent substance, very sweet. Surely one of the best and most beautiful yellow Tea Roses for general planting ever introduced. Remarkably hardy, both as to heat and cold, frequently standing the Winters uninjured in open ground without protection and blooming nicely through all the hottest part of the Summer.

ANNA MULLER.—The New Pink Baby Rambler. The shining, brilliant pink flowers are produced in great profusion, in large clusters, from June until late in the Fall. Each individual flower measures two inches in diameter. The petals are twisted, making a charming effect.

SCARLET BEDDER.—This is without doubt the very best of all Red Roses for bedding. It can be planted anywhere, being entirely hardy. Flowers are large size, fiery scarlet, a color rarely seen in Roses. Planted everywhere on account of its color and freedom of bloom.

For Only 35c. we will send The Housewife all the rest of this year and the collection of 6 Splendid Roses as above described, postpaid.

SIX SUPERB CARNATIONS

MISS MAUD MUELLER.—Scarlet and white variegated. Is one of the best Carnations for home culture, as it is easily grown, and not at all susceptible to the different Carnation diseases.

FLORA HILL.—It is the grandest white and the most prolific bloomer of the Carnation family that has been raised up to this time. The flower is of enormous size, full and double; has a good calyx; not subject to rust, produces good flowers throughout the entire season.

BOSTON MARKET.—In many sections this is being grown to the exclusion of all other white varieties. Can be depended upon for good sized, nicely shaped bloom in profusion. Stem, form and habit of growth excellent. Color ivory white.

MRS. FRANCIS JOOST.—This has proved to be one of the most satisfactory and profitable Carnations introduced in years. Color a soft shade of pink. It is a strong, vigorous grower, and is generally recognized to be one of the best Carnations. A variety that we can recommend in the highest terms.

HARLOWARDEN.—Very strong, free grower; extra long stems; large flower, of bright crimson with shadings of scarlet. Very free.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT.—Flowers large, very full, deeply fringed; deep brilliant, scarlet-maroon, full, rich and striking; a great producer, flowers averaging three inches in diameter.

For Only 35c. we will send The Housewife all the rest of this year and the collection of 6 Superb Carnations, as described above.

SIX GRAND CHRYSANTHEMUMS

ESTELLE.—Produces extra-sized flowers of the purest white; fine deep form; under the same conditions of culture it came a week earlier than its parent, Glory of the Pacific, with a far superior flower in shape and substance.

JULES HUMBERT.—Violet amaranth, reverse silvery white, enormous flowers of great beauty. This is one of the grandest early flowering varieties we have, and the color is distinct from all others.

GLORY OF THE PACIFIC.—It is of magnificent size and depth, with broad petals, which finely reflex, showing the clear pink color to excellent advantage. A pink of large size and good form. This variety will delight every grower.

MRS. HENRY ROBINSON.—In the entire Chrysanthemum family there is no grander white variety, no matter when it blooms: it is the most popular style—immense, incurving, broad-channeled petals of great substance and the purest white; from a flat incurved form it gradually changes into perfect ball of snow, sixteen to eighteen inches in circumference. Winner of twenty-six first prizes.

BLACK BEAUTY.—Color blood-red; petals long and curiously curled. A wonderful variety both in color and form. Both odd and beautiful.

PERCY PLUMRIDGE.—A very large Japanese incurved variety of buttercup yellow; bright and glistening. Was awarded the premium at the American Institute show in the class of "Fifty any Variety" against all competitors.

For Only 35c. we will send The Housewife all the rest of this year and the collection of 6 Grand Chrysanthemums, as described above.

SIX BEST GERANIUMS

MADONNA.—A magnificent bedding variety. Trusses are of extraordinary size, of almost Pansy form; the color is a soft, light pink, a beautiful and distinct shade. This variety has been universally admired by all who have seen it in flower.

LA FAVORITE.—The flowers are borne in large trusses of the purest snow white, retain this pure whiteness even in the height of Summer, and for winter blooming they are all that can be desired.

S. A. NUTT.—This is the darkest and richest Double Geranium grown. It is a very bright, dark, deep, rich velvety-maroon, an excellent bedder and a perfect pot plant; one that must find its way into every collection. Always in bloom.

HETERANTHE.—A magnificent variety. Flowers bright red, trusses of enormous size and borne high above the foliage.

P. A. STEWART.—A new Geranium and a new color, very difficult to describe. It is a very light cerise-pink shaded salmon. A splendid bedder and exceedingly free bloomer.

L. CONTABLE.—Plant of perfect habit; very free; large, full double flowers, of a beautiful bright rose color. An extra fine variety.

For Only 35c. we will send The Housewife all the rest of this year and the collection of 6 Best Geraniums, as described above.

WHAT SUBSCRIBERS SAY OF THE HOUSEWIFE:

"Everyone is pleased with THE HOUSEWIFE. I like it better than some of the higher priced papers."

"I consider the Editorial Outlook worth the whole year's subscription. It was an inspiration and the whole magazine is elevating and uplifting. Whatever your subscription list numbers, it should certainly be doubled."

"You certainly publish one of the best magazines going. I take and exchange with my neighbors, so I have the reading of more than a dozen, and yours compares favorably with the best of them."

"Your editorials are the best I have ever read; they have been helpful to me and I read them often in our Mothers' Meeting."

"While I am renewing my subscription I can't but speak a word of praise for our dear, good paper. I did think once I would not take it this year, but when the time came for it to come and I had waited, it just seemed as if a friend had disappointed me. I want to thank you and dear Hilda Richmond for the Little Lessons—they alone are really worth the price of the paper."

"It is an interesting paper; the editorials are uncommonly fine, calculated to do great good, and the stories are always practical and helpful."

"We have been readers, lovers and appreciators of THE HOUSEWIFE for years. In these days of yellow—deep yellow—cheap publications, words would not express our gratitude for the work of the Editor of THE HOUSEWIFE."

"I have received THE HOUSEWIFE and think it is just splendid. It is full of the very best reading, and the Editorial Outlook especially struck me as the finest thing I have read lately. We have mothers right around us that ought to read that editorial."

"Please accept my praise for the 1907 numbers of your magazine. I think it is one of the most interesting monthly papers that I have ever encountered, and contain the best of everybody. It has more stories in it than many of the ten and fifteen-cent papers. You have so many lovely short stories that THE HOUSEWIFE is one of the most welcome visitors that come to our house."

PLEASE NOTE that all subscriptions under these offers commence with the current number of The Housewife and expire with the December Number, 1908. The Collections cannot be broken, as by arrangements we cannot supply assorted collections. All of the plants offered are mailed carefully, direct from the greenhouses in Ohio, and guaranteed satisfactory. A reasonable time should be allowed for the filling of all orders. Cultural directions are sent with each collection. Please write all names very plainly. Satisfaction guaranteed or money refunded. Remit by P. O. Money Order or Registered Letter.

ABRAHAM'S SERVANT MEETING REBEKAH

Questions and Answers

M. V. V., Cleveland, O. Are Admiral Dewey and his wife Roman Catholics, and if not, to what religious denomination do they belong?

Mrs. Dewey is a Catholic, a member of St. Matthew's Church. Admiral Dewey affiliates with the Episcopalians and has a sitting at St. John's Episcopal Church, Washington, D. C.

A. J. Auburn, N. Y. A. wishes to sell some land and offers it to B. at a price much lower than he had heretofore held it. His offer was for $1,000, less $100 tax, which would become due later. A. expected to receive $900 from B., and the tax would be paid by B. as it became due. When transfer was made, B. paid A. $1,000, and said he would pay tax when it became due, this being as he understood A.'s offer. B. is very much pleased with his purchase. What are the moral obligations in the case?

B. has as good a right to say what the contract was as A. had. If A. offers to sell a watch to B. for $20, but B. understands him to say $25, and assents and pays the latter amount, there is no legal wrong in A.'s taking the larger amount. Of course, something depends on the relations of confidence between the parties; but in buying and selling parties deal at arm's length. The buyer wants to buy as cheaply as he can, and the seller to get as much as the buyer will pay. In the case supposed, A. has full value for his money, and has not been injured. If A. lives up to the Golden Rule, however, he ought to return $100, as being what he would like to have done to him if the conditions were reversed. C.

Enquirer, Plainfield, N. J. I have seen the name of Michael Angelo, the famous Italian sculptor and artist, spelled as Michel Angelo. Which is the correct pronunciation and spelling?

The first, the Anglicized form, has been used in English and American publications. Recently, however, the spelling, Michel, has been used as in the original Italian. Both are in good use. The Italian name, Michel Angelo, is pronounced Me-kel An-je-lo. The two names are sometimes now printed with a hyphen between them and in a very few cases as one word, but this is not really correct.

A Constant Reader, Bethlehem, Pa. Do second class passengers from Europe have to go to Ellis Island, the same as third class passengers? Do they have the privilege of landing the same day the boat arrives?

We are informed by the Cunard Company that second class passengers come directly to the dock in New York and do not have to go to Ellis Island unless they are ill. They land the same day, their privileges in this regard being the same as if they came first class.

R. B., Beverly, Mass. Is the Pool of Bethesda in existence to-day? Is it used for any purpose? Are its waters supposed to still contain healing properties?

Yes. The large reservoir or tank called by the Mohammedans Birket Israil, within the walls and close to St. Stephen's Gate, is generally believed to be identical with the Pool of Bethesda. It has been dry for nearly two hundred years.

Missioner Crittenden, Bellefonte, Pa. 1. What is the right name to give to the Sunday or Sabbath? 2. Is it consistent for a Christian Brotherhood to hold a "smoker" in the church?

1. Why not give it the Scriptural name of "the Lord's Day" (Rev. 1:10)? Sabbath leads to misunderstanding, for it is not a day of rest to hosts of the Lord's most devoted servants. Sunday, too, has a heathenish suggestion of sun worship, but not more than Monday, Thursday, etc. Your suggestion of Bible School as a title for Sunday School is good and may be used by persons concerned about such matters. 2. The "smoker" should not be held in the church, though it is said that in the times of the Dutch occupation of New York the pious burghers smoked in church during the services, but not during prayer, and they complained if the prayer was too long that "the pipes went out."

Subscriber, Lockies, Va. I am told that the order of Odd Fellows was founded in Baltimore. If not, in what country and by whom was the order first started?

Washington Lodge of Baltimore, established in 1819, was the first lodge of the order in this country, but the order itself was founded in England in the eighteenth century. In 1820 the Baltimore lodge received a charter from England, making it the Grand Lodge of the United States, but the next year gave in its charter and became subordinate to the Manchester Unity of his poems. The route of Revere has been marked in several places, so that to-day it may be accurately followed.

Reader, Newton Junction, N. H. Why are all the pictures of angels painted with wings? Is there any place in the Bible where it says that they have wings?

There are such passages, notably Isa. 6:2. The word wings, however, is often applied in a figurative sense, to convey the idea of the unimpeded, swift locomotion of the spirit as contrasted with the material body.

Church Member, Waldo, Fla. 1. Can a person of good character and irreproachable life be saved if he does not join a church when there are churches of all denominations in his neighborhood? 2. What is meant by Christ's statement, "the last shall be first" (Matt. 20:16)?

1. As we have said many times on this page, we shrink from declaring who will and who will not be saved. Who are we that we should presume to pronounce in such momentous matters? We can only remind you that Christ demanded public upon the wall of the room in which he was confined":

Could we with ink the ocean fill;
And were the sky of parchment made;
Were every blade of grass a quill,
And every man a scribe by trade;
To write the love of God above,
Would drain the ocean dry;
Nor could the scroll contain the whole,
Though stretched from sky to sky.

Reader, Johnsonville, N. Y. If a man dies without a will, being married twice, and leaving a child by his first wife, what share would the wife hold of the property?

In New York a widow takes one-third of the personal property absolutely and the use of one-third of the real estate for her life.

F. B. McC., Roseburg, Ore. What became of the dry dock sent from Hampton Roads to Manila, via Suez Canal, some time ago?

It arrived safely at Manila, and is there now.

A. F. A., East Oakland, Calif. Which States are Prohibition?

There are now twenty-eight Prohibition States, some wholly so and some in part, viz.: Alabama, Georgia, Kansas, Maine, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Mississippi, South Carolina, Florida, Connecticut, Vermont, New Hampshire, District of Columbia, Tennessee, North Carolina, Arkansas, Iowa, Michigan, Missouri, Delaware, Kentucky, Texas, West Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Nebraska, Massachusetts, South Dakota.

Reader, Eau Galle, Wis. Where do we get our marginal dates in the Bible?

They were compiled by Archbishop Ussher, a distinguished prelate who lived 1580-1656. They are simply chronological calculations and are not to be regarded in any sense as a part of the text.

Miscellaneous

M. J. P., Prole, Ia. The prayer in Congress is offered by the chaplain.

H. H. W., Fremont, O. Yes, there were two versions of the song you mention.

J. H. G., Kecksburg, Pa. We are unable to tell what was the first poem he wrote.

H., Thomasville, Ga. You can get the book you mention through Samuel French, 42 West Twenty-Second Street, New York City.

M. C. W., Mount Joy, Ia. There was no Mother Shipton. The so-called prophecies were discovered to have been written long after the date first attributed to them. This has been repeatedly explained in THE MAIL-BAG.

R. H. P., Reardon, Wash. We only have the figures for the battle of Waterloo. Wellington and Blucher lost 20,000 men. The French figures are not really known. Only the wreck of an army was left of a force of 71,947. Thousands were killed by the pursuing cavalry many miles from the actual field of battle, whole regiments practically disappearing without record.

R. M., Galena, Ill. 1. According to your letter, the hospital seems to be doing good, and the fact that it is under Catholic auspices should not prevent you from giving it support, as its benefits are probably shared by Catholic and Protestant alike. 2. Three times married. 3. Do you mean Carmelite or Campbellite?

Reader, Rockford, Ill. We received your question about the medicinal properties of the two rays some time ago. They are invaluable in locating foreign particles that have become embedded in the human body. We believe, however, that their use for treating certain diseases is still a matter of discussion. Ask your local physician.

Subscriber, Waldo, Me. There are Buddhist temples all over Japan, China, India, etc. We do not know to which one you refer. The New Testament has been translated, and most of the Old Testament, into every recognized language, and many additional dialects. You can probably get a full list by addressing the American Bible Society, New York City. You should sign your name and give address on all queries sent to the MAIL-BAG.

Order of Odd Fellows of the United Kingdom. In 1843 this connection was severed and the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows in the United States formed. Write to Washington Lodge in regard to the person mentioned; we are unable to verify the name.

Vira, Urbana, Ill. In Paul Revere's Ride, Revere had a lantern and it was hung in a window in a church in Boston, Mass. Will you please tell which church it was? Some say in the old South Church, some say in the old North Church. I have been trying to find where the poem is, but failed to do so.

The lantern was hung from the belfry of Christ Episcopal Church, commonly called the "Old North Church." The sexton of the church put out the lantern, the signal to Revere to mount and ride. Paul Revere had gone over to the Charlestown shore, and was waiting beside his horse for the signal. The old lantern is still a treasured possession of the Old North Church. The poem was written by Longfellow, and may be found in any collec-confession of him of his followers, and said that if any one was ashamed of him, of him would he be ashamed in the day of his glory. Joining a church is the recognized mode in these times of making public confession, but it is not necessarily the only one. 2. A reproof to envy and ambition. Those whose labors have been highly successful, or who have done some great thing in Christ's service, must not count on a high position as having been won by merit. Christ's rewards are for the Christly character, not for achievement.

Willard, Manhattan, New York. Are there any observatories in America that I can apply to for special information about the stars?

Yes, the National Observatory at Washington, D. C. Doubtless the professors in charge of the various college observatories would answer a few special questions if you are an interested student of astronomy.

GOVERNORS AND THE UNEMPLOYED

Governor Deneen, Ill.

Governor Hanly, Ind.

Governor Gu'd, Mass.

ONE of the most distressing features of the recent depression in all branches of trade is the unusually large number of unemployed to be found in almost every considerable sized city throughout the country. That the present condition is anomalous is shown by statistics that were recently laid before Congress on this subject. Representative Willets of New York, on March 13, in the course of his speech on the present condition of the working classes, submitted valuable figures relative to the situation in New York among the trades generally. He read a letter which was ordered to be printed in the Congressional Record, from the secretary of one of the leading labor organizations, giving the total of unemployed workers in the organized trades in New York City as 147,500. Seventy thousand of these are in the building trades alone. The same Congressman also submitted an estimate from the same authority, showing that 336,000 men are idle in the unorganized trades, 110,000 of whom are mechanics. The total estimated number of unemployed in the metropolis is thus placed at 503,500.

Many letters have been received from readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, evincing a keen interest in the labor situation, and suggesting that steps should be taken to distribute at least a portion of this surplus of idle labor throughout the country, in sections where it could be absorbed to advantage. Accepting this suggestion as one that might possibly result in relieving the situation, even to a limited extent, the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, as President of the Bowery Mission, addressed the following letter to the Governors of the various States:

"Dear Sir: New York City is deluged with workless men and boys, while in many parts of the country (perhaps in your own State) there is a great dearth of laborers. The Bowery Mission is in a position to supply any number of able-bodied workmen for unskilled labor at a moment's notice. Will you kindly help us to get these men an opportunity to earn an honest living by directing the attention of the different rural newspapers to this offer? All that will be required for those who wish help of any kind is to furnish transportation. We ask no remuneration for our services, and will endeavor, in every instance, to supply the very best help available. All applications for help should be addressed to the Free Labor Bureau of the Bowery Mission, 92 Bible House, New York City.

"President of the Bowery Mission.

"P. S. We stand ready to supply 2,000 men on demand."

Acknowledgments were received from many Governors, and in each case the Governor or his official representative displayed a deep interest in the subject. The correspondence, however, disclosed the fact that in no single State at the present time, as far as heard from, is there such a dearth of labor as would warrant the State authorities in inviting the New York unemployed to go there. On the contrary, the majority of the States have a surplus of unemployed labor of their own. This is the case in Michigan, Ohio and Wisconsin, where there are thousands of unemployed; in West Virginia and Indiana, Maryland, and presumably in others also. The Governors of Texas, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Delaware, Illinois and Montana, all have the matter under consideration, but their formal responses held out no hope of relief. Governor Hughes, of New York, promises to bring the subject to the attention of the State Labor Department.

In order that our readers may judge for themselves of the labor situation in the various States, we give below several of the Governors' letters:

THE AMERICAN PULPIT

A SERMON BY
Rev. F. De Witt Talmage, D.D.

The Message of Music

TEXT: I. Chron. 6:31: "And these are they whom David set over the service of song in the house of the Lord."

I WELL remember a Sunday I once spent upon the roof of the Cathedral at Milan. I had been away from home for many weeks and was very lonely and homesick. Furthermore, I was hungry for an old-fashioned Christian service of the type of the American meeting-house. I had been so long witnessing the European desecration of the Sabbath that I yearned for the simple service of my own home church. I entered the Cathedral of Milan that morning hoping that my longing for worship might be gratified, but alas! none of it was there. That huge cathedral is capable of holding forty thousand worshippers. Thousands of people were in the building that morning, but only a little handful were seated about the pulpit. Most of the people inside the church were tourists wandering about examining a statue here, a tomb there, a beautiful column beyond. Sick at heart I turned away and began to climb the stairs which led up to the roof. Higher and higher I went until I seemed to have left the world behind. Alone I was walking upon those lofty heights amid the marble statues, when suddenly I stopped short. Seemingly from everywhere, and yet from nowhere in particular, the sweetest anthem was rising in the upper air. Like the summer wind which kissed my cheek, I could not tell from whence it came. Then, as the voices rose and fell and finally died away in a plaintive whisper, I said to myself, "That must have been like the singing in the old Temple of Jerusalem." It seemed as though choir-loft was taking up the refrain of choir-loft, and the great Asaph himself, the chief of all the musicians and singers whom David appointed, was leading in the service of song.

Generations of Song

Sitting there that Sunday afternoon on that Milan roof, I thought of that service of singers in Jerusalem three thousand years ago, and of the singing of the long succession of all the generations of singers that in the Christian Church have won their triumphs during the past centuries. It seemed as if they were all united in one great service of song, in stupendous harmonies. For wherever you go you find the love of music. The English plowboy sings as he drives his team. The Scotch Highlander makes the glens and gray moors resound with his beautiful songs. The muleteer of Spain cares not who sits on the throne or stands behind it if they will let him have his early morning carol. The vintager of Sicily has his evening hymn even beside the fire of the burning mount; the fisherman of Naples has his boat-song to which his rocking boat beats time on that beautiful sea, and the gondolier of Venice still keeps up his midnight serenade. So, when traveling by land or by sea, we find the innate love of music waving her magic wand over the cradle as well as in the evening twilight of the grave. And inspired poets and musicians of the past and the present have merely harnessed up that innate love in the heart of man and used it for God and for heaven.

To-day, God willing, I want to lead you away from pulpit and lectern. I want to lead you away from altar and chancel and out of the church auditorium, and have you sit with me as I sat that day upon the roof of the Milan Cathedral and give your thoughts to the sweet sounds in which the church in all times has given praise to God. I want to have a little quiet talk with you upon the influence of Gospel song. And after this talk is ended I want you to go home and reverently take down your hymn-books and gather your children about you and teach them to sing praises to God, and utter in tuneful words the love of Christ for all men. "And these are they whom David set over the service of song in the house of the Lord."

The Singing in the Temple

Now, why did David appoint musicians over the service of song in the Temple? First, because music is a combination of beauties in sounds, and no man can truly come to the higher Christian life until he learns to appreciate the beauties of all God's creations. God does not simply say to man, "I am God, Creator and Ruler"; but he says, "I want you to notice that I have made everything beautiful in its time." Thus Jesus bade us look at the lily, or the wild flowers of the field, and observe the care with which God had produced a masterpiece in colors. He makes the leaf of that wild flower so beautiful that artists for centuries have tried in vain to reproduce its harmonies. Oh, the marvelous blending of colors in the leaf of one little daffodil! Then think of God's architecture! What is the Cathedral of St. Peter in Rome, or the Cathedral at Cologne, or any of our architectural masterpieces, in comparison with the grandeur of the Alps or the beauties of the Grand Canon? God's love of beauty shows itself here, as it does in the flowers that are in these days again preparing to make the world a glorious garden. We know from all his works that he loves beauty, and are sure that when we strive to make his worship sweet and harmonious with his gift of voice and with musical instruments, we are pleasing him.

Is not the voice of a great congregation lifting its song in praise like the sound of many waters? Have you ever noticed how many times the Bible tells us to sing the praises of God? Not once, but many times, is the commandment given. "Sing" is the word. "Let everything that hath breath praise the Lord." When the time of worship which we spend in the Lord's house is so precious, would God be willing to waste any of the time of church service in singing if music was not a divine means of spiritual grace? Yes, hereafter we must look upon music as a preacher. We must reverently consider our hymn-books as second only in importance to the holy Bible itself. God has placed his divine approval and endorsement upon them.

Sacred Music Honored

Why does God honor sacred music in the salvation of men? This fact should be easily analyzed when you open any hymn-book and begin to sing the grand old songs which have come ringing down the corridors of the centuries. What is the keynote of nine-tenths, ay, ninety-nine hundredths, of the hymns which are sung? God's wrath? No. It is God's love. Of course there are some of the old hymns which contain warnings to the sinner. But in nearly all the hymns that we love the central magnet of our affection is the story they contain of the Cross and God's protecting care for his children. Hell and the terrors of future punishment may lift their red lights of warning; but it is only the Cross of Christ that can make men cling to God as a heavenly Father. Just read over the favorite songs of your hymn-book and see if what I say is not true. And this is the reason why the song which is sung after the sermon often does more good than the whole sermon, upon which the minister has expended weeks of labor. Why? Because the preacher too often wields the Gospel bludgeon. He is bound to declare the whole counsel of God, and sometimes it must sound harsh. He says: "The end of sin is death, and God will not by any means accept the impenitent." Then some sweet-throated songstress arises in the choir loft and lifts up her voice in praise to him for his mercy in redemption. As the sweet message of God's love wings its way to the heart of the worshippers, men say, "I will do this not because I fear hell, but because Christ died for me, and because Christ loves me." Was not this fact demonstrated in the great services of Dwight L. Moody?

No intelligent man can study the work of America's greatest evangelistic preacher, unless at the same time he follows the wonderful career of America's most wonderful Gospel singer. "What do you think of the work of Ira D. Sankey?" I asked one of the greatest and most influential ministers of the West. "He is emphatically the messenger of gentleness. This fact was never better illustrated than by comparing the work of a Moody and a Sankey." "Great team that," I said. "Yes, a great team." Why? Because each man's work supplemented the work of the other man. Moody was an earnest, conscientious preacher. Moody would stir an audience until men and women could see their sins marching before them in an appalling procession, and they could realize the peril of their condition. Then Sankey would sing of the life-line, or of the ninety and nine, and the love of God touched the hearts of men until the whole audience would be melted into tears. Moody was essentially the plougher and the sower. Ira D. Sankey was the reaper. He was the one who could soften the heart and make sinners feel the love of God by the power of Gospel song. The ploughing had to be done. Each man supplemented the work of the other man. Moody and Sankey formed the most potent evangelistic team of the past century.

A Stimulant to Service

But there is another reason why Gospel singing has been baptized by the Holy Spirit for the salvation of men. Gospel singing stimulates the worshiper to do something for Christ. It is his part of the church service. The minister may be praying, but the members of the congregation may not be following him in his prayers. While the minister is preaching, the solemn-faced elder sitting before him may be planning how he is going to run his business the next day. That was a quaint and beautiful compliment which Mark Twain gave to his minister some time ago. The great humorist met the preacher at the door of the church after the sermon and said: "My dear doctor, you will have to make your sermons more uninteresting or I cannot afford to come to church any more. Sunday morning in church, is the time I always expect to plan my week work. You are preaching such interesting sermons that I have to pay attention, and you must become more stupid or else I shall have to stay away." But, alas! when Mark Twain spoke in jest is only too true of song hearers. Whether it is the fault of the minister or not one fact is certain: Many a merchant has planned on his business deals during the Sunday morning sermon. And many a tired mother has taken a short cat-nap during the long prayer of the Sunday morning service. But it is so different during the time of Gospel singing. It is the difference of doing something for Christ and sitting passive in your pew.

Why did your mother have you children gather about that piano to sing? What was her chief reason? It was to get you to do something good to keep you from doing something positively harmful. O friends, do not think that the time you spend with your children singing is wasted time. If some parents would do a little less scolding and a little more singing with their children, perhaps they might have just the same spiritual influence for good as had your sainted mother when she gathered the children about her every Sunday afternoon to sing the Gospel hymns.

The Power of Sacred Song

But there is another truth which comes surging over me with overwhelming power when I think of the divine purpose of sacred song. That is the thought that the great hymnologists have always been the Gospel teachers who have been able to overleap all the barriers of sectarian bigotry and narrow-minded creeds. If the great hymnologists have accomplished no other good, at least they have taught us that Christ has many other sheep who do not belong to our sectarian fold. In olden times the Episcopalian rector would not allow the Presbyterian pastor to enter his chancel. And the Presbyterian and the Hardshell Baptist were just as bigoted in their way as their Episcopalian brothers. But no sectarian bigotry has been able to monopolize the makers of sacred song. In the sectarian churches we have "spite fences" for every one except for our poets and hymnologists. Read over if you will the biographies of the greatest of our Gospel composers. They belong to all churches.

Charles Wesley may never have been allowed to preach in Westminster Abbey, but his great hymn, "Jesus, Lover of my Soul," has been sung there a thousand times. And Charles Wesley was a Methodist. Who was Ray Palmer, the author of "My Faith Looks up to Thee"? A Congregationalist. Who was Horatius Bonar, the author of "I Lay my Sins on Jesus"? A Scotch Presbyterian. Who was James Montgomery, the author of "Hail to the Lord's Anointed"? He was the son of a Moravian preacher. Yet all these singing evangelists with their many different sectarian creeds have their names and their hymns printed side by side in every church hymnal. The church of Bishop Heber may believe in apostolic succession for the pulpit; but it does not believe in apostolic succession for the choir loft, for Henry Newman the Catholic, and John and Charles Wesley the Methodists, and Horatius Bonar are allowed to sing there even though they were not allowed to preach there. Oh, why do we not extend the hand of Gospel fellowship to all the members of the different churches as we extend the hand of Christian love to all the sweet singers who bring to us their Gospel songs? May God give to us a non-sectarian pulpit and pew as he has given to us a non-sectarian hymn-book.

Divine Harmonies

But God honors sacred music for still another reason. The divine harmonies of sound place the hand of holy ordination upon all those who are willing to lift up their voices in his praise. In order to become a minister one has to spend years in study. Then presbytery puts him through the most rigid examinations to determine whether he is fit to preach. Some of my ministerial brethren may be in doubt about letting him pass at that time. But though some presbyteries may make mistakes in allowing a candidate to enter the pulpit when not properly prepared, no such barriers can keep the true Gospel evangelists from singing the praises of God. Ira D. Sankey not only led thousands into the Kingdom by his tuneful voice, but he sent a host of singing evangelists to win other multitudes for the Cross. In other words, as the good Ananias was commanded to open the blinded eyes of Saul in Damascus,

TO OPEN THE PUBLIC DOMAIN

A MEASURE has been introduced in Congress, having the endorsement of the President, which, when it becomes a law, may cause a rapid decrease in some of the overcrowded sections of the older States and swell the population of the New West.

It provides for the increase of the "homestead right" from one-fourth to one-half section. A man who could formerly take up one hundred and sixty acres of land under the Homestead Law, will have the right to take up three hundred and twenty acres. At the rate public land has been withdrawn from government ownership in the last three years, it would take twenty-seven years to fully settle the vacant areas. Under the new law, Western immigration will be encouraged, and it is believed there will not be an acre of "free land" anywhere ten years hence, except on the bleak and barren mountain sides above timber line.

According to recent reports gathered by the writer from land offices in the West, there are at present 30,000,000 acres of public land, valued at $7,450,000,000. Of this vast area, 150,000,000 acres are irrigable and cannot be taken up except when a water right is purchased in connection therewith. This costs from twenty to fifty dollars an acre. The amount of land to be taken in an irrigated district cannot exceed one-fourth section. There remains open for entry about 220,000,000 acres of farming land, which can be taken at the rate of $1.25 an acre payable in five years. If the law passes any man or woman at the head of a family can take one-half section of this land, and by residing on it fourteen months, can obtain a deed. Here is an official statement which shows the manner in which public land is being taken: Appropriated or land owned by individuals in 1904, 795,000,000 acres; in 1907, 432,000,000 acres. In three years, 49,000,000 acres of public land had been filed upon by 310,000 persons, supposed to be heads of families, each representing at least four persons. Thus over a million citizens of the United States became land-holders at the cost of sixty million dollars, payable at the rate of twelve million dollars per annum.

Public land open for entry in the United States is located in these States: Nevada, 55,000,000 acres; Montana, 50,000,000; New Mexico, 45,000,000; Arizona, 40,000,000; Utah, 38,000,000; Washington, 35,000,000; Idaho, 30,000,000; California, 30,000,000; Colorado, 30,- 000,000; Wyoming, 30,000,000; Oregon, 15,000,000; North Dakota, 10,000,000; South Dakota, 10,000,000; Nebraska, 5,000,000; Minnesota, 3,000,000; Oklahoma, 2,000,000; Florida, 1,100,000; Kansas, 1,000,000; Michigan, 195,000; Arkansas, 2,000,000; Mississippi, 90,000; Wisconsin, 70,000. Total, 434,755,000 acres.

Of the forty million acres open in Arizona, much is tillable and only needs more rainfall to make rich. About 200,000 acres of Arizona's dry land are now being irrigated. Lands in the Gila, Salt and Santa Cruz River valleys have been pronounced more fertile than the Nile valley in Egypt. Here the home-seeker has the opportunity of taking up land under the Homestead Act, to entry. Florida lands open for public entry are swampy and mostly valueless at this time. The State is now draining the swamps. Idaho has 30,000,000 acres of land available. Much of it is rich, level and splendid for agriculture. Kansas has very little public land, all in the western part, and it is being taken very rapidly. Louisiana has several thousand acres of pine forests that can be entered by any citizen who will pay $1.25 an acre, and live on the land fourteen months. Michigan also has a couple of hundred thousand acres of fine timber land open to the public. Minnesota has about 3,000,000 acres of open prairie, much of which only needs the touch of the tiller to produce wealth. Mississippi offers 90,000 acres of rich delta land, good for farming when it does not overflow.

Montana and Nevada are the largest public land States in the Union, each having over 50,000,000 acres. Montana contains much rich farming soil, and the vast areas are fine for sheep grazing, while in the valleys, farmers can obtain good lands for general farming. About one-half million acres of desert land in Wyoming is now being irrigated. Nevada is the largest public land State and has a special law permitting a settler to take a whole section, or four times the amount now allowed, or twice as much as allowed by the new act of Congress. Nebraska and North Dakota offer fine grazing lands for public entry. Some of the land can be farmed without irrigation. New Mexico contains 45,000,000 acres of land open to entry under the land laws. None of it is worth a cent unless irrigated.

Most of the desirable public land in Oklahoma has been taken. In Oregon much of the free land is covered with timber. South Dakota also has good farming land to the extent of 10,000,000 acres. The soil in Utah is adapted to fruit growing. Wyoming offers rich mineral and general farming land to the man who will go out there and pioneer. In Eden Valley 150,000 acres is being opened under the Carey Act at fifty cents an acre for the land, and thirty dollars for water rights.

Uncle Sam certainly offers something worthy in these public lands, and the homeless man may not long remain the landless man if he will take up the matter with the proper authorities at Washington.

W. R. DRAPER.

Choosing a Home in the Missouri Valley

Arkansas contains two million acres of land open to public entry. This land is rugged, suited for fruit and truck farming, and contains much valuable timber. Fruit grown in the Ozark Mountains, where there is a million acres of government land still to be taken, has won international prizes.

California, with its 30,000,000 acres of public domain, offers mostly mountain and desert land. The government is spending $3,000,000 dollars in California to reclaim deserts. This land is open, under the Carey Act, at fifty cents an acre for the land and thirty dollars an acre for a perpetual water right. Colorado has 30,000,000 acres of rich mountain and timber land open this modern Asaph has been ordained to loosen the dumb tongues of men who could have had no part in winning souls except by sacred song.

A Gospel hymn is a sermon. A Gospel hymn is a prayer. When you listen to a testimony in a prayer-meeting you do not listen to oratory. You listen to a man pleading for Christ. When you listen to a Gospel hymn, you listen to a disciple of Christ pleading for the Master in the same way. And though your voice may not be musically trained, yet when you sing God's praises in a simple Gospel song God will bless you as he does when you arise to testify for him in a meeting of prayer.

The consideration of this subject suggests to me three practical lessons. First, I want to impress upon all Christian people that the church which does not put a great emphasis upon its music is making a fearful mistake. "Why do you give out so many hymns in your prayer-meetings and church services?" a friend said to me some time ago. "Because I cannot give out any more hymns," I answered. "I believe that the singing of a church is more important than the preaching. Indeed, I know that what I say is true; for many a church is existing in spite of poor preaching. But you never saw a strong church that did not have fine church music. Church members, beware how you trifle with the music. Get the best hymn-books. Ministers and officers, prayerfully select the hymns that all people can sing. Do not make your singing a mere accessory to the church. God is watching you when he says: 'Let everything that hath breath praise the Lord.'"

The next great fact to which I would call your attention is that of your church choir. Sacred singing is an important part of church worship. Therefore, we should be careful whom we select as the members of our choirs to lead us in that song. It is essential that those leaders be living sweet, pure, Christian lives. I care not how brilliant a minister might be, you would not knowingly select him for your pastor if you knew he was immoral or a drunkard. Why should not the same purity of life be required of the members of our church choirs? It is a shame to see some people rising in the choir-lofts to sing the most sacred words in our hymn-books when every one knows that they are living lives that contradict the words they are singing. I have had men and women in my choirs who never made any pretense to religion. These members of the choirs never attended prayer-meeting. They never put their foot inside the Sunday-school. They did what they were paid to do, and they did nothing else. They sang Psalm tunes on Sunday and, as far as I can make out, served the devil the rest of the week. God will never bless a church unless that church has just as pure and as consecrated a choir-loft as it has a consecrated ministry. Mark that.

Lastly, I want you to get into the habit of singing Gospel songs wherever you go. Learn to sing Gospel hymns on the street and in your home when you are dressing. Teach your children to sing these songs in the same way. There is no easier way to spread the Gospel, and to show people that you are standing for Christ, than by singing about him when you are at work. Have you ever attended a great Methodist camp meeting? Then you may have been impressed by the preaching. But I will tell you what you were mostly impressed with, and what has lingered longest in your memory. It was not the service in the auditorium, but what took place after the audience was dismissed. Then the young people, I mean all those who were young in heart—and they all seemed to be young—formed in line and marched around the grounds singing some old hymn like: "We are Marching to Zion, Beautiful, Beautiful Zion." As they sang the very heavens seemed to join in the harmonies. Oh, how that music rings to-day in your memories! Like a great army the people moved as they sang. Cannot you in the same way sing about Christ when you are at work? Like a great singing host let us move forward to capture the round world for Christ.

There is a beautiful story told that many years ago when Jenny Lind was visiting this country she called upon her countryman, John Ericsson, but the famous inventor refused to see her. Ericsson had a magnificent brain, but he was no respecter of persons. He declined to see her. Not to be put off Jenny Lind sent up her visiting card. She stepped to the foot of the stairs and began to sing one of the old Swedish lullabies with which the mothers in that far-off land are accustomed to sing the children to sleep. At once the door of the inventor's room opened and Ericsson came to greet his visitor, weeping like a little child. The music had opened the door of his heart. So by singing the old Gospel songs on the streets and in the homes, we can win multitudes for Christ.

HELPING THE COLORED RACE

OUR readers will be pleased to see the photograph on this page of the scenes daily witnessed on the grounds around Mayesville Institute in South Carolina. The children and young people shown in the photograph owe a debt of gratitude to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD which they are not slow to acknowledge. The self-sacrificing band of colored teachers and workers would not have been able to gather that crowd and educate and train them if the generous friends of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD had not contributed so liberally to the funds of the Institution. The gratification, as in all cases of generous gifts, is mutual. He that gives has reason for rejoicing as has he who receives.

In this case there are three parties to the blessing: the givers, the managers of the Institution, and the children, and it is astonishing how fruitful the harvest has been in which all three will eventually participate. Christ spoke of the recompense which at the last day will come to those who have given to the poor and needy: "They cannot recompense thee, but thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just" (Luke 14: 14). It will be good in that day to receive the recompense at his hands. Then there are the managers and teachers, with Miss Emma Wilson, the founder, at their head, who have laid down their lives to help the poor of their race, but whose good will and sublime aims would have been futile without the funds thus provided. Finally, the students, enabled to earn an honest livelihood by useful work through the technical training they receive, no longer gaining a sparse and precarious living by unskilled labor, but as bricklayers, masons, tailors or shoemakers, taking their places in the higher ranks of labor. These boys and girls raised from drudgery will bless their benefactors to the end of their lives.

Over six hundred of these colored students are now receiving instruction in the Institute, some as boarders and the others as day scholars. Many of the former earn the money for their school fees by their own labor on the Institute farm, working a part of the day for the privilege of studying in the remaining hours. This class might be largely increased if funds were available for the young people of the neighborhood are eager to enter on those terms. They appreciate with an avidity highly creditable to them the advantages of education and their teachers testify that their intelligence and industry are wonderful. The economy with which the institution is run surprises all the Northern friends who have examined the accounts and balance sheets which have been prepared and regularly audited. The wonder is that so much has been done on so small an income. Money given to such an institution is made to do the utmost possible. A small sum enables the managers to keep a student at his or her studies, who might otherwise have to leave them unfinished. Besides this, money is needed for books and educational appliances and for tools and materials in the various training shops. It is urgently needed at the present time, and if sent to this office will be gladly received and acknowledged in our columns.

Thousands Idle in Ohio

STATE OF OHIO,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR.

My Dear Sir: Governor Harris is in receipt of your inquiry of the 7th, and directs me to advise you that he at once took up the matter with the Commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, and regrets to be obliged to inform you that there is no probability of any portion of Ohio being able to employ outside labor in the near future. Things may not be as bad here as they are in New York; but there are thousands out of work, and the indications are that, even with a speedy resumption of many institutions now closed down or running half time, there will be a greater supply of all kinds of labor than the demand.

S. J. FLICKINGER,
Secretary to the Governor.

Maryland Has No Work

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

ANNAPOLIS, MARYLAND.

Dear Sir: I am in receipt of your letter in reference to the workless men and boys in your city, and I am very sorry that I know of no place in our State where they could receive employment. I will keep the matter in mind, however, and notify you should anything favorable turn up.

AUSTIN L. CROTHERS.

50,000 Idle Men in Wisconsin

STATE OF WISCONSIN, BUREAU OF LABOR, ETC.

Dear Sir: Your favor of the 7th inst., addressed to Governor James O. Davidson, has been turned over to this office for reply, and in reply will say that this office, together with the Free Employment Offices established by this State, are already burdened with applications for work, and I will not be able to give you any assistance. There are 50,000 men in the State of Wisconsin looking for work, and we are exerting every energy possible to find such places. It will be folly for us to attempt to induce more men out of work to come to this State.

J. D. BECK, Commissioner.

Michigan Has Many Idle

STATE OF MICHIGAN,
EXECUTIVE OFFICE, LANSING.

Dear Sir: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your esteemed favor of March 7. In reply I will state that your communication will be referred to the Commissioner of Labor. It is, however, extremely doubtful if that Department or the newspapers of this State can render you any assistance in providing employment for the unemployed workmen of New York City. In a lesser degree, the state of affairs you describe prevails in some of the larger cities of Michigan, and it would, I think, be difficult to secure employment for outside workmen.

FRED M. WARNER, Governor.

Governor Chamberlain's Suggestion

Governor Chamberlain, of Oregon, writes from the Executive Department at Salem: "Oregon is fully supplied with able-bodied and willing workmen both for city and country, and is not in a position to assist in relieving the congestion of unemployed in your city and throughout the East. The situation is distressing with you, I know; but it seems to me that you will be able to accomplish much more good for the unemployed laboring men in this country, if you, and those who are associated with you, will take active steps to prevent the great transportation companies from bringing an undesirable class of immigration, which is crowding our own people out of employment and filling our country with an undesirable class. If this can be done, it will not be long until the present congestion is relieved."

From Michigan Labor Commissioner

STATE OF MICHIGAN,
BUREAU OF LABOR, ETC., LANSING.

Dear Sir: Your communication addressed to Governor Warner has been referred to this department. In answer to same I will say that at the present time there is a great surplus of idle labor in this State. One year ago we could not find men enough to place in any shape, but at the present time it would be like "carrying coals to Newcastle" to send any more labor to Michigan. We are greatly in hopes that as the spring opens times will change along this line. Not that the factories are idle or that business is at a standstill; but there has been a curtailment all along the line.

M. J. McLEOD,
Commissioner of Labor.

Louisiana Gives No Hope

Commissioner Schuler of the Louisiana State Board of Agriculture and Immigration, writes from Baton Rouge, La., that "there is a considerable demand in the rural portions of Louisiana for persons experienced in farming, to work crops of cotton, corn, etc., on shares, half and half. Only men with families are desired."

The Commissioner explains, however, that the cities of his State "are full of men who have no work," and that experience has shown that workless city men make poor agriculturists, as a rule. He holds out no hope to the unemployed.

West Virginia Sees No Relief

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF LABOR.

Dear Sir: Your letter 7th inst., addressed to His Excellency, Gov. Wm. M. O. Dawson, Charleston, W. Va., has been forwarded to this office for reply. It is with regret that I have to inform you that West Virginia can give you no relief. We have hundreds of idle men in the manufacturing centres of our State, asking for work; and I see no immediate relief, but hope for the best.

I. V. BARTON, per M. B.

From the foregoing letters, it will be seen that but little ground exists for hoping that any immediate relief can be rendered from the different States to the half-million unemployed in the metropolis. Usually with the approach of spring the labor situation improves, especially in the building trades, and it is not improbable that it may do so this year, although thus far there has been no marked improvement except in a few localities. Meanwhile the long months of enforced idleness have involved the workers in many hardships and brought privation and suffering to thousands of respectable homes.

One of the saddest features of the situation is the Bread-Line. The men and boys who compose this line are not simply unemployed. They are homeless and destitute. Unlike a great majority of the idle workmen, who at least have a place they call home to which they can go for rest and shelter, these are waifs who have sunk so low in the hopeless struggle for existence that even in the heart of the great populous metropolis they are friendless, helpless and ready to give up the fight unless some kind hand is providentially extended to them. This is just the kind of people the Bowery Mission is designed to help. Yet, although the Mission has doubled its Bread-Line and gives a midnight meal to two thousand unemployed men and boys every morning, this beneficence is merely a drop in the bucket. A hundred Bread-Lines would fail to satisfy the hunger that is the daily portion of these idle multitudes.

Some critics of the Bread-Line, in ignorance of its real character, have charged that it is composed chiefly of petty criminals, worthless vagabonds, loafers, tramps and "unemployables" generally. It would be hard to find anything farther from the actual fact than this cruel and inhuman characterization. On the night of January 17, a careful and thorough poll was taken of the Bowery Mission Bread-Line, with the following result:

Carpenters.....	56	Porters.....	103
Steam fitters.....	20	Longshoremen.....	147
Plumbers.....	10	Elevator men.....	6
Blacksmiths.....	8	Window cleaners.....	3
Moulders.....	4	Mechanics' helpers.....	8
Brass workers.....	3	Laborers.....	226
Boiler makers.....	6	Masons and plasterers.....	36

Bakers.....	6
Butchers.....	18
Kitchenmen.....	50
Waiters.....	48

		Total.....	1,593

From the foregoing it will be seen that practically all the organized trades are represented in the line, together with many that are unorganized. The building and allied trades are among the greatest sufferers by the prevailing depression. Seagoing workers (sailors, firemen, riggers, oilers) are heavily represented. Altogether it is a showing which puts to the blush those ungenerous objectors who, sitting "at home at ease," have denounced these unfortunates, and even suggested that the "proper way to deal with the Bread-Line was to stop the bread." If they could only spend one short hour with the men of the line, their hearts would melt within them and they would form a new estimate of their unfortunate fellow men.

Victory for the Motto

BY a vote of 259 yeas to 5 nays, the House of Representatives on March 16 passed the bill providing for the restoration of the time-honored motto, "In God We Trust," to the National coinage.

This triumphant result of the campaign to put back the motto was foreshadowed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD some time ago, and, therefore, was not unexpected. Nevertheless it was something of a surprise to have a vote so sweeping in its favor as to be almost unanimous.

The bill was reported from the House Committee on Coinage, Weights and Measures by Representative William B. McKinley, of Illinois, Chairman of the Committee. He had no difficulty in obtaining unanimous consent for its consideration. In the course of the debate Representative J. H. Moore, of Pennsylvania, who introduced the bill, said that the President had given him assurance that if Congress directed the restoration of the motto, he would not veto the bill.

On the passage of the bill those who voted against it were Cooper, of Texas; Gordon, of Tennessee; Kustermann, of Wisconsin; Barboldt, of Missouri, and Slayden, of Texas.

Representative O. M. James, of Kentucky, one of the most vigorous champions of the bill, told the House that the country was to be congratulated that its trust in God was to be restored. Christian people believed a great mistake had been made in ordering the motto to be taken from the coinage.

Representative Kustermann made the only speech against the bill. He spoke in condemnation of those who, while demanding the restoration of the motto, had their hands in their neighbor's pockets. If the motto were to go back on the coin, said Mr. Kustermann, there ought to be printed on notes of higher denominations, and especially those of $1,000, "Honesty is the best policy."

Representative Morris Sheppard, of Texas, another enthusiastic advocate of restoration, also spoke.

Mr. Moore gave the assurance that the President would not veto the bill, and added that the President had said to him that he would respect the wholesome moral and religious sentiment of the country, if the bill was passed.

Representative Sheppard asserted that only infidels had been pleased by the removal of the motto. He declared the removal had been an inspiration to every infidel in the United States.

Representative Kustermann and Gordon argued that the uses to which money is put in the United States made it common hypocrisy to urge a retention of the motto upon any coins. Much poetry was read and many quotations from the Bible cited during the debate. Representative Carlin spoke of the recognition of deity on the coinage in ancient times.

Representative Ellis, of South Carolina, quoted a poem on the subject, one verse of which was as follows:

We bowed before the shrine of wealth
And, drunk with riches, went astray.
Restore, O God, the nation's health
And lead it in the old true way.
In sorrow, shame and vain regret,
We plead that thou wilt spare us yet.

Copyright, 1908, by Cinedust
Representative W. B. McKinley, Chairman of the Committee

Representative Gaines, of Tennessee, demanded a roll call on the passage of the bill. Thirty-six Democrats and one Republican (Kustermann) stood up to be counted in favor of the demand. Then the roll was called with the result given above: 259 for its passage, and only 5 against.

This decisive vote in the Lower House is the climax of a long and exceedingly interesting agitation which began many months ago. When the new coins were issued, without the familiar motto, "In God We Trust," letters poured into the editorial offices of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from all parts of the country protesting against the omission as irreverent, and a needless slur on the memory of the honored statesmen who placed the motto on the coins during a very trying period in our national history—at the crisis of the Civil War.

It was Hon. James Pollock, Governor of Pennsylvania, next preceding the great war Governor, Andrew G. Curtin, who placed the motto on the coinage. In 1861, President Lincoln appointed Ex-Governor Pollock Director of the United States Mint; Hon. Salmon P. Chase being then Secretary of the Treasury. President Lincoln and Mr. Pollock were very intimate, and while Secretary Chase, as an official, would be called upon to approve so important a matter as a motto on our coins, President Lincoln was also consulted and also approved the motto. The bill framed by Governor Pollock, providing for the motto, passed both Senate and House by a unanimous vote.

Governor Pollock has been called the "great Christian Governor" of Pennsylvania. He was a thorough Christian, and a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church for almost a generation. He was the lifelong personal friend of Lincoln, who sent for him and consulted with him on the state of the country and the formation of a Cabinet. His appointment as Director of the Mint was President Lincoln's own act. It was to have been expected that the American people of our own day, knowing the past and reverencing the motives of Lincoln, Stanton and Pollock in those days of trial, would resent the unceremonious removal of the motto which those patriots had placed on the coinage, and which had proclaimed to the whole world for nearly half a century the nation's trust in God.

When the protests which flowed in upon THE CHRISTIAN HERALD assumed unusual proportions, they were forwarded en masse to Congress, where, through the spirited advocacy of Representatives Morris Sheppard, of Texas, and O. M. James, of Kentucky, they were laid before the House and published in THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The widespread national protest did not pass unheeded. Splendid support for the bill to restore the motto was rendered by the two Congressmen named, and also by several members of the Committee on Coinage, Weights and Measures, including the Chairman, Hon. W. B. McKinley, and Hon. J. H. Moore. The last named drew up the bill which was finally submitted. Having passed the House it will now go to the Senate, where it will probably be adopted without delay.

THE LOST BIRTHDAY

ON February 28, 1900, occurred an astronomical event which had not occurred in one hundred years, and would not again for two hundred years, or until A.D. 2100. The phenomenon affected the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, myself and all who were born on February 29. It was connected with leap year, and as the subject, in its entirety, is not well understood, it has seemed to me as though, in view of this being a leap year, a short article on the subject would be interesting and instructive.

In our school days, we were taught that every year divisible by four without a remainder was a leap year, giving the year 366 days by adding February 29. According to the Julian Calendar, which assumes that the year is 365 days and six hours long, this is true; but according to the Gregorian Calendar, it is not exactly true, but fails three times in 400 years. The Julian Calendar was inaugurated by Julius Cæsar forty-five years B.C., and is in annual error by eleven minutes and fourteen seconds, which, if allowed to continue uncorrected, would in many thousands of years make our winter months to be June, July and August. The accumulated error already amounts to thirteen days. It is only used in Russia and Greece. Recently, we celebrated Christmas on December 25. Russia celebrated it on January 7. After this century the number of days difference between the two calendars will be fourteen.

The Gregorian Calendar was inaugurated by Pope Gregory, in 1582—assuming the length of the tropical year to be 365 days, five hours, forty-eight minutes and forty-seven seconds, which is its true length to within two or three seconds, the error not amounting to over a day in 2,850 years. The Julian Calendar adds one day to the year every four years, while the Gregorian drops three days every 400 years, and the rule for their dropping is that all centennial years, to be leap years, must be divisible by 400, as well as by four. Therefore 1600 was a leap year, but 1700, 1800 and 1900 were not; but 2000 will be.

Now the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD can see why all who were born on February 29, no matter in what year, got no birthday in 1900. It was because it was one of the three dropped centennial years, which will not occur again for 200 years. This explains also why I, born February 29, 1820, have at this date had but twenty birthdays, having had but one (1904) since 1896.

The sum total of this whole matter is: First—Everyone born on any day except February 29 gets a birthday every year. Second—Everyone born on February 29 gets a birthday every fourth year. Third—Everyone so born gets a birthday every fourth year, except (according to the Gregorian Calendar) that three leap years dropped as above explained in 400 years, as was the case with one of them in 1900.

Now for the Senate!

HAVING passed the House of Representatives, the bill authorizing the restoration of the motto on the coinage now goes to the United States Senate. In order that our friends may be intelligently informed regarding the situation, and as to their part in the further successful prosecution of the campaign, we cheerfully give space to the following letter:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 17.

Dear Dr. Klopsch:

As you have doubtless noted in this morning's press, the bill restoring "In God We Trust" passed the House of Representatives yesterday by the tremendous majority of 259 to 5. I wish to congratulate you on the splendid work you and your great paper have been doing in behalf of the restoration of this beautiful and significant legend. The battle, however, is not yet won. The bill now goes to the United States Senate, and may be overlooked by that august body. It is necessary to bring the matter in every effective way to the attention of every Senator. The campaign should now be directed toward the United States Senate.

Every person in the United States who desires the restoration of the words "In God We Trust" to our coinage should write his or her Senator promptly and emphatically.

With every assurance of regard, I am

Yours very truly,

[Signed]

MORRIS SHEPPARD,

M. C. First Texas District.

We hope that our readers will follow the excellent advice of Congressman Sheppard, and send in their protests to the Senate in such numbers that that august body will recognize the voice of Christian America on this great question and pass the bill without delay.

The Passion for Law-Making

DOWN in the State of Texas, where they grow good ideas as well as wonderful crops, they have acted on the theory that it would be a good plan to have "fewer, but safer and saner, laws for the State." To further that idea, and give it practical form, a convention was recently held in Fort Worth, which was attended by five hundred men, representing agriculture and commerce. A committee of prominent men was appointed to embody valuable suggestions for the betterment of Texas laws.

Other States might take heed and profit by the example. The various States have a passion for law-making. In most of them the legislatures meet every year, and about every member of those bodies seems to think the more bills he introduces on every conceivable subject the more active and conscientious public servant he will be considered. The average number of laws passed by any one State legislature in a session fills a fair-sized volume. We will have one good law dealing with a certain phase of life and then it will be added to and subtracted from and patched here and there until the man who drew it up first is unable to recognize it, and after it is passed it will have to be sent up to the Supreme Court of the State to be interpreted. We have hundreds of laws on our statute books that actually nullify one another and result in endless confusion.

What the country needs is not an avalanche of new laws every year, but the enforcement of the laws we have got. We are great on law-making, but very poor at making these same laws operative. The laws under which we live, in a general way, are good, but there are a large number that are rated in the "dead-letter" class, because the American people have not insisted with one voice, and loud enough for those who are acting as public servants to hear, that if a law is a good one it is to be enforced. Of course, if it is a bad one, the sooner it is repealed the better.

A Tribute to Motherhood

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT is a man of ideals, and he frequently gives them felicitous expression. When the members of the Mothers' Congress took the White House by storm a few days ago, the President and Mrs. Roosevelt received them, and the President delivered a little sermon on offhand talk on child welfare, which was a fine example of mingled patriotism and good sense. "The mothers of the nation," he said, "deserved all honor."

While all good men could attain to good citizenship—the soldier, the sailor, the civilian—the mother, he said, was the "best citizen of all." If she did her part aright in rearing and training her boys and girls, she moulded the character of the men and women of the next generation, and consequently wielded a greater influence and filled a more honorable position than any man could ever hope to do. He pictured her life of self-sacrifice, of effort, of suffering, of patient education, and pronounced her the one supreme asset of national life, more important than the most successful statesman, millionaire, business man, artist or scientist. He said much more to the same point, and no doubt the ladies of the Congress felt that all American womanhood, in their persons, had been highly complimented.

It was a graceful and tactful thing for Mr. Roosevelt, amid his multifarious duties, to find time to pay this high tribute to American motherhood. Certainly it was a well-deserved tribute, as all right-thinking men will gallantly allow. We cannot have good men, good citizens, nor a happy and prosperous nation, unless the home life is what it should be. And the key to the home life is, after all, the mother.

The Governors and Labor

IT is not a hopeful showing that is made in the remarkable series of letters from the Governors of more than twenty States, the substance of which appears elsewhere in this issue. As contributions toward the public enlightenment on the labor situation, however, these letters are of the first importance. They disclose the fact that the trade depression has been far-reaching, and that at the present moment there is hardly a State in the Union which has not its thousands of unemployed workers, who are fighting a hard battle with adversity and hoping for a general revival of industry in the near future.

One argument, based on a mistaken impression as to the real situation, is effectually disposed of by these letters. It is frequently urged that the congestion in New York, with its half-million unemployed, should be relieved by sending these idle workers to other States. While this might be sound counsel in normal times, it is the reverse while the present depression lasts. The Governors are a unit in declaring that there is not enough work for their own unemployed and no immediate prospect of improvement. To transport any portion of New York's idle thousands would be to make matters infinitely worse. It would impose upon other States the thankless burden of their support.

This vast plethora of idle labor is a direct legacy of the panic. Governor Chamberlain, of Oregon, regards it as a result of our practically unrestricted immigration, which, he declares, has allowed the great transportation companies to bring in an undesirable class, which competes with our own people and crowds them out of employment. It should not be forgotten, however, that an unprecedented exodus of these immigrants has taken place within the last four months, without materially relieving the situation. There are hopes that, as spring advances, conditions may improve, and that with returning confidence in general business circles, our idle industries may resume their activity, bringing work and happiness, where now there is so much suffering and discontent.

An International Problem

AFFAIRS in the island republic of Haiti have reached an acute stage where not only the people of the country are intensely interested in the outcome of the present unsettled political condition, but the United States, Great Britain, France and Germany as well. Ever since the Haitian Republic achieved its independence it has been subject to revolutions, arising not so much from the discontent of the people with any President or government, as from the vaulting ambition of some politician, who, as is usually the case in Haiti and Santo Domingo, is also a general. Consequently the aspirants were always sure of some military backing when they started an insurrection. Presidents who were ready to spend money for civic improvements, did not dare to do so for fear of being caught with an empty treasury if a rebellion should occur. For, as one Haitian cleverly put it, "No man will spend money on a road when he needs it to save his own neck."

During recent years, however, insurrections have been less frequent, and Haiti was fast winning a reputation for stability, and the country has been fairly prosperous. In an editorial in our last issue we spoke of the decision of President Alexis to permit the embarkation of refugees who had sought shelter in the consulates. The act was magnanimous, but that which followed within a day or two must be classed only as wantonly bloodthirsty. Eleven citizens were taken out and shot on the charge of aiding insurrection. If the men had been tried and then condemned, outsiders would have no particular right to object, but in this case there was no trial.

At this point the commanders of foreign warship decided that they should intervene, as all foreigners were threatened. This decision had a quieting effect on the Haitians and may lead to the solution of the present difficulties. We have no sympathy for those who say the Haitians have no ability to govern themselves. They have done as well as most of the Spanish republics in South America. The Spanish republics, however, have nearly learned the lesson that insurrections and punishment without trial do not pay. If Haiti learn this lesson also, there is no reason why her people need not be among the most prosperous in the West Indies. Until then Haiti remains an international problem, and an American fleet in her vicinity would seem to be an imperative necessity.

Among the Workers

—EVANGELIST ROBERT E. JOHNSON has just closed a series of union meetings in a specially erected tabernacle at Miller, S. D., with over four hundred professions. People drove distances of from ten to thirty-five miles to attend the meetings. Among the converts was the mayor, a former states attorney and one of the largest ranchmen of that section.

—REV. LUCIUS B. COMPTON, evangelist, has just concluded a series of meetings at the Gospel Mission, Washington, D. C., which was wonderfully blessed. Mr. Compton, at the age of nineteen, was converted in the Rescue Mission, Cincinnati, since which time he has been an evangelist. He was born in the mountains of North Carolina and has established two institutions—a Rescue Home for Fallen Girls and an Orphanage at Asheville, N. C.

—EVANGELIST C. R. HAUDENSCHILD began an engagement in Pendleton, Ore., January 22, to continue three weeks. The time was extended to four weeks. Five churches, the Baptist, Congregational, Methodist, Methodist South, and Presbyterian, were united. Two hundred and seventy cards, expressing conversion and church preference, were signed at the altar. More than once the men outnumbered the women in the evening audiences. Among the converts were some of the strongest business men in the community.

A Tissot Masterpiece

There is no finer example of the art of the late J. James Tissot than his painting of the meeting of Abraham's servant and Rebekah, which is reproduced on the front page of this issue. Reading the story in Genesis 24: 15-28, and remembering that Tissot spent a great part of his life in studying the manners, costumes and customs of the people of Bible lands, and in familiarizing himself with their traditions, one can better appreciate the peculiar art of this painter who, more, perhaps, than any other artist, succeeded in transferring to canvas the very life and spirit of the ancient Orient.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

A Famous Pass

ONE of England's little wars, now happily concluded, has involved her troops entering the famous pass noted in history as the battle-ground of nations. It is that by which more than once armies have poured into India. The mountains which form the natural boundary to India on the northwest are penetrated at this point by the narrow ravine known as the Khyber Pass, thirty miles long, and bordered by mountains, rising in most places by sheer precipices six hundred feet high. Through this pass, the fierce and hardy Afghans could march southward into the fertile plains of India, or the wild Indian tribes could march northward to ravage Afghanistan. It has for more than a century been vigilantly watched by Great Britain, under the apprehension that her enemy, Russia, might bribe the ruler of Afghanistan to let her pass by this road into India, and she has been careful to win the good will of the powerful tribes at both ends of the pass. The recent friendly arrangement with Russia effected by King Edward VII., has removed this apprehension, and there has no longer been the need to pamper and conciliate these tribes. Even the tribe known as the Zakka Khels were no longer regarded as its privileged guardians. The result has been a condition of brigandage which has steadily been growing more and more intolerable. The tribe, familiar with the recesses of the Khyber Pass, have descended on the villages at its exit, have carried off money and cattle and retreated to the pass, where they were safe in its inaccessible caves. Their final outbreak, which rendered their suppression imperative, was a raid on Peshawur City itself, when they seized the chief bank, shot the clerks, looted its vaults and carried off the chief citizens and held them for ransom. Then the British government ordered an expedition dispatched against them. It was a formidable and dangerous undertaking and was put under the command of Sir James Willcocks. It has been carried forward successfully and now the news comes that the tribe has suddenly laid down its arms and submitted to the British commander, and its representatives have entered his camp and given pledges of amity and good behavior.

They were cordially received and they asked pathetically if they had not fought bravely. Sir James happily replied that he would not have shaken hands with them had they not. Thereupon, they were led to a place where a meal was ready for them, and they appear to have been quite ready for it. That the surrender was genuine was proved by the immediate cessation of the continuous fire that had been kept up on the British advance for several days. The expedition has cost in money $3,750,000 and many valuable lives, but the result, it is believed, will be peace and order and quietness in the future. It may be hoped, for the sake of both sides, that the promise of good behavior will be kept, and that the submission is not due to fear, only to be repudiated when force is withdrawn.

Wherefore ye must needs be subject not only for wrath but also for conscience's sake. (Rom. 13:5.)

Naval Pride Hurt

General resentment has been aroused among the officers and men of the navy by a sentence pronounced by Judge Tuthill of the Juvenile Court of Chicago. It appears that a boy of sixteen had been brought before the Judge on a charge of stealing. It was not his first appearance in the dock of that court, and the Judge was inclined to be severe. The boy told him, however, that he had an elder brother in the navy who had promised to look after him, and expressed the wish to enter the navy. He believed that if he did, he might become a good man. In all his judicial acts, that is the object Judge Tuthill seeks, so he suspended sentence, and bade the boy join the navy and straighten up. Naval officers in Chicago thereupon made vigorous protest, and sent complaints to Washington. They submitted that the reputation of the navy would be injured if it became a habit to condemn convicted thieves to the service as if it were a reformatory. They do not realize that there is no higher honor that can be won than that of winning a soul from sin to righteousness.

They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars for ever and ever. (Dan. 12:3.)

Needless Apprehension

An amusing story of a child's distress is related by a teacher in the Sun. "It has been our custom," she says, "to have a lecture every Friday afternoon. One day the lecturer was a geologist and chose Niagara Falls for his topic. He told us about the geological formation of the falls, described the different periods to be traced clared that if he had known what the effect on his nerves of association with demented people would be, he would have preferred electrocution. He could not conceive of any offense so disgraceful, or so inherently wicked, that would not be adequately punished by such an experience. Two legacies from members of his family have been left to him during his detention, and he pleaded that now, after twenty years' confinement, he be released to begin life anew. It was not so much the detention that became intolerable to him, as the association with demented people. It is that far worse association that makes the doom of the impenitent in the next world so dreadful.

That righteous man dwelling among them, in seeing and hearing, vexed his righteous soul from day to day with their unlawful deeds. (II. Peter 2:8.)

Extraordinary Somnambulism

In a hospital in Birmingham, England, is a patient whose strange powers have attracted wide attention there and have been submitted to eminent psychologists here. The patient is a music teacher whose habit of walking in her sleep had developed so far as to alarm her family. She became in fact a confirmed somnambulist, and this strange development caused much sorrow and no little uneasiness to her relatives. They sent her to the hospital in the hope that it might be cured. She was allowed to do as she chose, but was kept under observation while her case was studied. She habitually left her bed after three or four hours and busied herself in various ways, including descending into the music room and playing the piano, tuning a violin and fitting new strings to it, and crocheting. Her most remarkable feats, however, were reading and writing in the dark. This development is extremely rare in somnambulist cases. If there was even a faint artificial light in the room she would avoid it and go over to the darkest corner, where she would read, study and write letters. When awake she has no recollection of having been reading or writing. An examination of her eyes reveals no reason for her being able to see in the dark. Her condition is obviously abnormal, but it is an indication that the human personality, in spite of the theories of materialists, is gifted with powers of which in the gorge, and then went on to say that the falls were slowly wearing back toward Buffalo and that in the course of some two hundred thousand years they would be worn back to Erie, Pa. Suddenly one of the girls in my class began to sob convulsively. 'What is the matter?' I asked in alarm. 'Oh,' wailed the girl, 'my sister lives in Erie.' The child reversed the attitude of those whom the prophet warned. She was distressed by fears of a calamity so distant as to be of no concern to her or her sister, while they persisted, as many hearers of the warnings that God's servants give in this day, in referring to a far-off, indefinite period judgments impending over themselves.

The vision that he seeth is for many days to come, and he prophesieth of the times that are far off. (Ezek. 12:27.)

Twenty Years Among Maniacs

Application was made recently to the Supreme Court of New York State for the release of an inmate of Matteawan Asylum. He had been sent there twenty years ago for committing a murder, and deemed himself fortunate in being sent there instead of to the electric chair. He knew himself to be sane, but supposed his incarceration in the asylum would be easy to bear. He had a different story to tell when he came into court. He de-we have no conception in our present state.

After my skin, even this body, is destroyed, then without my flesh shall I see God. (Job 19:26, R. V.)

An Uncertain Site

A curious problem in conducting a marriage ceremony arose recently, owing to a change in the course of a river. A minister in the southern part of South Dakota was called upon to officiate at a wedding in a home in a bend of the Missouri River. During high water the river had burst over the narrow neck at the bend, and at the time of the wedding it was flowing on both sides of the cutoff, so that there was a doubt as to whether the main channel—the inter-State boundary line—was north of them and they were in Nebraska, or south, and they were still in South Dakota. To be assured of the legality of the marriage rite the bridal couple, minister and witnesses rowed to the north bank, and up on the South Dakota bluff the marriage service was performed, returning afterward to the State to which they owed allegiance. The marriage ceremony, however, could not change the residence; but to the Christian, the period of his union with Christ changes his whole life, and he is required ever afterwards to live in conformity with it.

Come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord. (II. Cor. 6:17.)

HOLIDAY TIME IN KURDISTAN

IT seems paradoxical to speak of holidays in lands where there is but little cheer for oppressed humanity.

This is the case especially with the Armenians in Kurdistan, near to and southwest of Mt. Ararat. Though they may not speak of their ancient history, nor dwell on their patriotism as a race, yet under the name of church or religious days they have over a hundred holidays in the year. Such days usually have attached to them some saint's name, and so, amid this multiplicity of days, little of real hilarity appears. The exception is their somewhat public wedding engagements and their marriages. In the latter case the merry-making and feasting are sometimes prolonged two or three days and nights. During the direful events of 1894 and 1895 very few marriages took place, and the life of the Armenians seemed funereal indeed.

Of all holiday seasons Easter, Christmas and New Year's are the most generally celebrated in Armenia. Our Oriental friends are a full thirteen days behind us in the month's calendar, as their reckoning is "Old Style." Another anomaly is their Christmas, which follows their New Year by six days, coming January 19, our reckoning. New Year's is a "family day," though little "calling" is done. Sweetmeats and small presents are given in the family. Christmas is more of a church day, when the clergy as well as others do a good deal of calling, especially the priests, in hope of perquisites.

Our Protestants in the town and villages over in our "Ararat parish" also have their holidays, and we have had echoes of these in serenades, Christmas trees, etc. Soon after begins Lent—the "Great Fast" as they term it—which brings in the chief time of the year for marriages. In ordinary times drink stronger than wine is sometimes brought out, but not among the Protestants. In view of the abject poverty of the present time, when bread is at double and even triple prices, few of the natives drink.

The much-dreaded Kurds are ever ready for an escapade in hopes of plunder, when the poor Armenians are likely to suffer, if not in property, then in other ways. The local government is frequently unable to restrain these wild Kurds. Not infrequently they have tribal feuds among themselves, for the Armenians have little left for booty to satisfy them, and so they turn on one another.

With present famine prices here in the East we have to watch after the Bitlis Relief Fund most closely, lest we be forced to turn the Armenian orphans into the street from lack of money. It would be a dangerous thing, especially for the poor girls, to be exposed in streets that are filled with Kurds, soldiers and miscellaneous vagabonds.

In our factory where we have weaving, shoemaking, tailoring, etc., our boys are learning enough of the trades to nearly pay their board, and when graduated, they can even lay up a little besides. Their school training fits them to make a living and to set up homes under ordinary conditions; but just now the outlook is dark indeed.

We are grateful for all the help extended by your readers to us for our work at Bitlis.

The mission station of Bardezag is situated on the foothills overlooking the beautiful Gulf of Ismid, just opposite to the ancient Greek city of Nicomedia, sixty miles from Constantinople. Just now permission to visit the capital can scarcely be had under any plea, merchants may not go for goods and women servants may not go to their employers. A well-known professor lately obtained permission from the local government to visit his brother for three days, but on reaching the terminus, he was carried to prison, where he was kept thirty hours in company with equally innocent men of good family, and also with actual criminals. At the end of that time it was decided that he could not be allowed to visit the American College, or indeed see any one in the capital, so he was put by the police on the train and sent back.

Bardezag is to-day one of the most flourishing and hopeful mission training stations in this part of the world. The visitor finds at the eastern end of the village a group of imposing new buildings, the largest of which houses 100 boys. Day school attendance brings the number of scholars up to 186. The other buildings include a Boys' Home, Gymnasium, Lecture Hall and several others. A new workshop is needed where the boys could be trained industrially. Various forms of manual work are an important part of the system. For three years carpet weaving has been carried on. All earnings by this and by silk-worm raising go to the support of the orphans.

Of course, the chief object is the character training and winning the boys to Christ. The daily Scripture lesson, the regular Sunday services for the school, are the acknowledged times for sowing the seed. In the Boys' Home the elder boys gather the younger ones at 6:30 each morning to read with them the portion for the day. They are now starting a temperance meeting amongst themselves, which they officer and manage independently. In the High School there have long existed flourishing branches of the Christian Endeavor and temperance societies, as also a Benevolent Society. This winter they made little self-denial offerings for their starving brethren in Van.

There is an opening here for young men fresh from college, who wish to enter on missionary work. Two such are needed for teaching English, Scripture and gymnastics. All information on the subject may be had from Rev. James L. Barton, D.D., 14 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.

CANADA'S HISTORIC FIELDS

ALL Canadians, the people of Great Britain and of the United States are taking an active interest in the project of Earl Grey, Governor-General of the Dominion, to preserve and suitably mark the historic battlefields about the ancient walled city of Quebec.

Earl Grey wishes to prevent the further encroachments on the Heights of Abraham and the field of St. Foye. On the first it was definitely settled that Great Britain should rule in Canada, and the battle of St. Foye, won by the French, undoubtedly enabled the French Canadians to secure better terms when Canada was ceded by France to Great Britain. At present, on the Plains of Abraham, there is but a small shaft marking the spot where General Wolfe "fell victorious" on that battle-day of 1759. On the St. Foye road, another simple shaft bears the brief but telling bronze inscription, "Honor to the Brave."

People this side of the Canadian line are in hopes the fields will be suitably marked and preserved, as those battles had a marked effect on the subsequent history of the colonies. Many Americans fought in the red ranks on the Plains of Abraham, and some at the battle of St. Foye.

It is proposed to erect a gigantic figure of an angel of peace on the outermost bastions of the citadel, who, with arms outstretched, will seem to bid welcome to the new-comers to the Dominion by the way of the St. Lawrence. Both French and British Canadians are working together to carry out the project, showing how well old feuds have been forgotten, and that as a united people they wish that the places marked by great deeds and heroic self-sacrifice should be preserved as a memorial.

THE REVOLUTION IN HAITI

DURING the last few weeks passengers on steamers whose course lies near the coast of Haiti have noticed, very now and then, a column of black smoke rising from the funnel of a swiftly speeding ship. As the ship drew nearer it would evolve itself into a man-of-war, flying the Stars and Stripes, the Union Jack of Great Britain, or the triple bars of the flag of France. The warship might hover a moment on the steamer's course and then turn toward land, whither it had been called by the civil strife in the Haitian Republic. For such a small part of the earth's surface, Haiti, for the last few weeks, has managed to make itself the centre of interest for the foreign departments of the American government, of Germany, France, and Great Britain, and as this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD goes to press, it seems likely that important international complications will arise that may cause one or more governments to land troops on the island, if they have not already done so.

In our last issue, under the title of "Magnanimous Haiti," we published the account of the liberation of several foreigners who were accused of complicity in the rebellion against President Alexis's government. Recent developments, however, would make it seem that the magnanimous policy was at an end.

Haiti has been noted as a country in which the party or parties out of power have striven to upset the existing government by force if the opportunity offered. The recent, or present, revolution has been led by General Firmin, an officer who has had a large following in Haiti. The revolutionists' plans miscarried, and many of the conspirators who could not escape across the border, sought refuge in the consulates of foreign governments. The prisons were overcrowded, both with prominent Haitians, who, he alleged, had been found conspiring for a second uprising. The hapless men were pulled from their beds—it was yet dark and about three in the morning. Before any great alarm could be raised, they were hurried to the outskirts of the city, and when near the cemetery, were lined up facing several files of soldiers. A sharp command, followed by the glint of lowered rifles, a volley crashing its echoes among low hills, and the participation of eleven leading citizens in the affairs of the country was forever at an end. General Leconte is the newly appointed is justification for this state of feeling. The Haitian army is one not to be despised. The military spirit is strong, and while there is a great preponderance of officers over privates in the army, all have shown that they can carry themselves well under fire. They dress in French uniforms, and use much of the French drill. French is the language spoken, and the higher officers cherish much of the French military traditions. They have an artillery school and one other institution devoted to the military instruction of cadets. A great many of the officers were sent in their youth to France, and not a few were trained in the famous French military school at St. Cyr.

While the excitement was at its height, the British cruiser Indefatigable appeared from Kingston, Jamaica. She fired a salute of thirteen guns, and the city was thrown into a panic, as it was thought that these were the forerunners of a bombardment. Soldiers were sent out hastily in all directions by the government to pacify the crowds, and quiet reigned once more.

A few hours later, the black hull of the German cruiser Bremen was discerned making its way into port. Shortly after the President and his cabinet issued a statement that they had "decided to accept the friendly request of the Powers and permit the embarkation of the refugees from the consulates at Gonaives, Port de Paix" and other places—a triumph, it is said, for the diplomacy of the French minister. The execution of suspects, however, was still a bone of contention. President Alexis claimed that he had found that those who had been shot had planned to overthrow the government, and that his cabinet ministers acted to save the State, and that as long as they were Haitians who were executed, outside governments had no right to interfere.

actual revolutionists, caught with arms in their hands, and with political suspects, the latter constituting by far the largest number.

The French minister was very anxious that those who had sought refuge with him should be allowed to leave on French warships and was making progress with the negotiations. On Sunday morning, however, people living near the cemetery in Port-au-Prince heard shots fired in rapid succession. It was discovered that Minister Leconte had sent troops to the houses of eleven Minister of the Interior, and he offers a marked contrast to his pacific predecessor.

That day and those that followed were filled with terror for the people in Port-au-Prince. Only officers and officials dared to appear on the streets, where soldiers with fixed bayonets patrolled every corner. Wild rumors were heard on every hand that foreign warships were coming, and that all foreigners might be massacred by the infuriated Haitian troops, who felt that the revolution was helped by outsiders, and in part there

According to the programme arranged by the foreign ministers, the French cruiser D'Estrees would go to Gonaives and take on board General Firmin and the other refugees in the French consulate, and sail with them to the island of St. Thomas. The German cruiser Bremen would follow the D'Estrees and take off the refugees in the Spanish and German consulates at Gonaives and in St. Marc. Probably this will be carried out before these lines strike the eye of the reader. The United States has three warships in the vicinity.

ASTRONOMICAL QUERIES

Answered by Prof. S. P. Leland, Ph.D., LL.D., Seabreeze, Fla.

J. E., Lexington, O. I heard a minister say that he once saw the star that guided the wise men to Bethlehem. He said it was a small red star in the northeast, which appears only once in 360 years. Was he correct?

The statement you report is apocryphal. Astronomers have no knowledge of any star with a periodicity of 360 years. What the minister saw may have been a meteor or a comet, or more probably, olefant gas. Had such a star appeared within the present generation, the fact would have been recorded by a thousand pens.

Alice E. P., Kokomo, Ind. Is not the great sun affecting the climates of this earth, i. e., making our winters warmer and the time of intense cold and deep freezing shorter; also our summers cooler, longer and more rainy?

The sun has great influence upon our climate. It is impossible to calculate its extent. The sun is almost thirteen hundred thousand times the size of our earth, and any considerable disturbance upon its surface affects our little globe, as a breath would affect a feather. Compared with our sun our earth is a toy. It thrills and vibrates with every considerable chemical change of the great luminary. Just how the climate is affected, and the complete philosophy of its changes, are not well understood. The changes of climate are too local to be wholly referred to the sun. They are frequently continental. Other than solar influences are at work. For years the winters in Russia and northern Turkey have been uncommonly severe and their summers very warm; while with us the temperature has been quite the opposite. These modifying influences are, however, secondary.

A LIFE-GIVING SAVIOUR

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

"THE Jews also weeping!" The Jews had followed Mary to the tomb because it was the custom to visit the grave, especially during the first three days, and the custom also for friends to accompany the bereaved. There can be no doubt that the weeping of the Jews was something more than customary mourning, for Mary and Martha and Lazarus were greatly beloved in Bethany.

"He groaned in spirit and was troubled." Why should Jesus be troubled when he knew he had power to bring Lazarus from the dead, and intended to do it? It was the unbelief which he saw in the hearts of the Jews which troubled him.

"Jesus wept." Jesus is reported only four times to have wept, the first time

"If thou wouldest believe, thou shouldst see the glory of God." So spake Jesus to Martha. And by so doing he brought Martha to her better self. Her doubts were removed, and she was no longer a stumbling block to those about her.

"Then they took away the stone." The Jews were all the more ready to do it when they saw that hope had dawned in Martha.

"Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me." These words are a part of the prayer with which Jesus girded himself before he proceeded to raise Lazarus from the dead. Why did he pray? Not for himself, because he knew that all power had been given him, but "because of the people that stand by." Jesus' great desire was that the occasion should when he stood by the grave of Lazarus. Weeping is no weakness; it is the overflow of strong love. Jesus wept; therefore let not the holiest and best be ashamed to weep. "Jesus wept." "He wanted the whole of sorrowing humanity to be his in sweet, everlasting sympathy. Great souls weep fruitful tears, and their fruit is the salvation of God's children."

"Jesus therefore groaning in himself cometh to the grave." It was the second time Jesus groaned because of the unbelief of the Jews, which they no longer hid in their hearts, but expressed with their lips, saying that if he really had power to raise Lazarus from the dead, he could have prevented his dying.

"It was a cave, and a stone lay upon it." The tomb of Lazarus as shown to travelers to-day appears to be a pit, rather than a tomb cut in the rock, and so the stone may be said to have been laid upon it, rather than against it, as a stone was placed afterwards against Jesus' own tomb, and rolled away by the angel.

Jesus said to the Jews standing there, "Take ye away the stone." "Lord, by this time the body decayeth" (R.V.) said the sister. Even Martha had no faith to believe that Jesus had power to bring her brother back to life. Before he died she had faith that Jesus could cure him of his sickness, and therefore had she sent for him to come. She may have shared in the usual idea among the people that the spirit of the dead hovers about the body for three days, and then departs. It was the common Jewish idea that corruption commenced on the fourth day, that the drop of gall which had fallen from the sword of the angel, and caused death, was then working its effect, and that, as the face changed, the soul took its final leave from the resting place of the body.

be the means of their knowing that he and the Father were one.

"Lazarus, come forth!" "He flings a word into the grave, and Lazarus stumbles forth, dazzled, into the light."

"Loose him and let him go." And they loosed the bands with which he was bound from head to foot, and removed the napkin from his face. What happened afterwards? How they loved him, what they said, what thanks, or praise, or worship, the sisters spoke, and what were Lazarus' first words, we know not.

Triple Consolation

The writer, conducting the funeral of a young man whose parents, sisters and friends were present, grouped three texts for comfort and hope. Turning to the friends he said, "Our friend sleepeth." Turning to the parents he said, "Thy son liveth." Turning to the sisters he said, "Thy brother shall rise again." Such are the lights which Christianity casts.

The infidel Countess of Hanover ordered that her tomb should be made of heavy blocks of granite and inscribed, "This tomb shall remain undisturbed throughout eternity." But God's mighty frosts separated the stones, and into the crevice his winds blew the dust, and then an acorn fell there and grew into a tree that lifted out of its place the very slab that bore the defiant inscription. So truth triumphs over error, and life over death. It will help us to realize immortality, to keep ever in the mind the fact that soul and body are as organist and organ, as tenant and house.

When John Quincy Adams was eighty years old, he met in the streets of Boston an old friend, who shook his trembling hand, and said: "Good morning, and how is John Quincy Adams to-day?" "Thank you," was the ex-President's answer, "John Quincy Adams himself is well, sir; quite well, I thank you. But the house in

We want to send you a free sample of a roofing which requires no painting or coating, either when it is laid or in after years.

Painting a roof is work. Buying paint is expense. Both are needless if your roof is Amatite.

When you finish laying Amatite you can take away your ladder, pick up your hammer and knife, go away and leave the roof to take care of itself.

This is due to the fact that Amatite has a real mineral surface—a surface that is too strong to need protection—too durable to require painting.

Amatite comes in rolls of 110 square feet ready to lay. No special tools are required; anyone can lay it properly. Liquid cement for laps and nails furnished free.

The Sample of Amatite will be forwarded free on request. Send for it and see how much better it is than the kind which requires painting to keep free from leaks.

A Wife's Choice

What is it like in daily life? "One Sunday evening an incident occurred at the lodging house in Rivington Street, New York, which shows that some of the homeless wanderers are keenly alive with religious feeling. When the boys had assembled in the reception room after supper, the superintendent proposed that they should join him in reading a chapter of the Bible, and asked if any one had a passage to suggest. A lad fourteen years old called out, 'The eleventh chapter of the Gospel of St. John,' which was read by the boys in unison, and with much apparent interest. At the close of the meeting the superintendent asked the lad why he preferred that particular chapter. The poor fellow unbuttoned his vest and drew forth a Testament, worn almost to shreds, and with tears in his eyes said: 'Three years ago my mother gave me this Testament on her dying bed, and made me promise to carry it always, and read it as often as I could. I have done so, and somehow get most comfort out of this eleventh chapter of St. John, because I think that if Jesus wept from sympathy with the sisters of Lazarus, he can feel for a poor bootblack like me, and will enable me to love him and keep his commandments.'

The Lost Cup

There is a story of a servant receiving a silver cup from his master, who suffers it to fall into a vessel of aquafortis, and seeing it disappear, contends, in argument with a fellow servant, that its recovery is impossible, till the master comes on the scene and recovers the silver by infusing salt water, which precipitates the silver from the solution; and then, by melting and hammering the metal, he restores it to its original shape.

What is it like in nature? Look at those grassy mounds in the cemetery. In the light of this truth, the eye of faith sees them changed into a field sown with seeds of immortality. Blessed field. What flowers shall spring there! What a harvest shall be gathered there! In the neighboring fields, "whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap"; but here how great the difference between what is sown amid mourner's tears, and what shall be reaped amid angel's joys; between the poor body that we restore to the earth, and the noble form that shall spring from its ashes! Those who saw Lazarus' putrid corpse, looking on the raised body with health glowing on its cheek, saw nothing to match the change the grave shall work on these mouldering bones.—Guthrie.

"In every leaf on the summer boughs there is a network which may be dissolved out of the verdant portion, and yet retain as a ghost the shape which it gave the leaf from which it came. In every human form growing as a leaf on the tree we know that network lies within network. Each web of organs, if taken separately, would have a form like that of a man. There might be placed by itself the muscular portions of the human form, or the osseous portion, or the veins, or the arteries, and each would show the human shape. If the nerves could be dissolved out, and held up here, they would be a white form, coincident everywhere with the mysterious human, physical outline. But the invisible nervous force is more ethereal than this ghost of nerves. The fluid in which the nervous waves occur is finer than the nervous filaments. What if it could be separated from its environment, and held up here? The hand might be passed through it; the eyes of men in their present state could detect no trace of it; but it would be there."

What is it like in the Bible? We are reminded of the raising of the son of the widow of Nain, a work wrought by Jesus fully a year before. He, like Lazarus, was probably a young man. He had not lain in the grave, for Jesus had met the funeral procession as it was coming out of the town, and commanded those who were bearing the bier to stand still. And then he spoke the word of power: "Young man, I say unto thee, arise." And he that was dead sat up and began to speak. Then it is sweetly told that Jesus delivered him to his mother. It might be said that Jesus delivered Lazarus to his sisters, and the sweet home in Bethany, where Jesus loved so much to be, was again complete.

The First Palm Sunday*

ONE day set apart from all others in Jesus' life is that of his entrance to Jerusalem. The sole day of triumph for the Man of Sorrows. It was well that he should enjoy it before he suffered. The brief imperfect word of public welcome, the only one he was ever to hear, breaks in on the monotony of criticism, of contempt and of disparagement. Yet it was very small and insignificant. Such a scene occurring to-day in Washington, D. C., or in New York, would scarcely be noticed in the papers, unless some humorous reporter happened to witness it and made it the subject of an amusing article. A man riding into the city on a donkey, preceded by a group of enthusiastic children, who were shouting and carpeting the street with tree-branches, was not a particularly impressive spectacle to the superficial observer. Yet there was significance in it if we look at it closely.

This Man was a teacher, who had dared to contradict the theologians of the most ecclesiastical city in the world, and charge them with misleading the people. He had torn down the separating barriers and opened the way to God himself. No longer, he declared, need men observe the frivolous details of the ceremonial law, no longer be snubbed and kept down by haughty priests. Here was a Man who associated with the lowliest classes and invited even publicans and sinners into his Kingdom. If the common people of Jerusalem had understood the significance of what Jesus was doing for them, the demonstration would have been far greater than it was.

Even so poor a thing as this provoked Christ's critics. "Bid them hold their peace." Every hosanna, every welcoming word was an offense to these envious men. It disturbed their peace, it broke in on their decorous quiet and broke up the calm and stolid system which they hoped was to continue forever. But Christ reproved them with the dignity of a king. He saw beneath the surface, and we see now that he saw truly. The very stones of the streets might have been quickened to speak, if these children had not uttered praises that they themselves may not have understood. But God would not let his Son go to suffering and death without some applauding words, and they were all the more welcome coming from children whom he loved so well.

A CAMPAIGN FOR VOTES

Mrs. Pankhurst

Miss Gamthorpe

Miss C. Pankhurst

Miss New

AMERICAN travelers in England, during the past year or two, have often been surprised to see repeatedly a line of women parading along the street in the large cities. They wore large placards swung front and back after the familiar method of the American "sandwich man." On the placards in bold letters were the words, "Votes for Women." The women in the lines were well dressed, and many of them evidently from homes of culture and refinement. They walked with a determined air and did not seem to flinch from the running fire of remarks by the bystanders on the sidewalk, which greeted their appearance.

"Votes for Women" is now heard all over England, and a campaign for woman suffrage which has been growing without attracting much attention, has now forced itself on the attention of politicians and public on account of the novel methods employed.

For fifty years, the women suffragists of England have held meetings, sent deputations to cabinet ministers, and influenced voters at home, something, by the way, which is not unknown in this country.

It was not, however, until Mrs. Pankhurst founded the Women's Social and Political Union that the movement made itself felt. Her methods and those of her followers can be characterized by no other word than militant. They have tried to force their way by sheer strength into the House of Commons, and two hundred of them have gone to jail for creating a disturbance at the doors of the Parliament House. Mrs. Pankhurst has gone to prison on account of her methods, and her daughter, Miss Christabel Pankhurst, the organizing secretary of the Union, has gone to prison twice. The suffragettes have asked questions at cabinet ministers' meetings. When these questions have been ignored or laughed down, they have broken up the meetings by charging on the platform and shouting so the speakers gave up in despair. Recently two of them chained themselves to the iron fence in front of the Prime Minister's office, until a large crowd collected, and the policemen had to chisel the locks and escort the women away. For two years this has been going on, and how much has been accomplished for the woman suffrage cause seems to be still a matter of doubt. Some women who are really interested in the cause, but prefer quieter methods, say that such aggressive tactics have put the cause back fifty years. Members of the Union, on the other hand, claim optimistically that their fight is almost won.

The campaign is conducted from the Union's headquarters at No. 4 St Clement's Inn, in London. There every one in attendance says Parliament will have to give votes to women during this session. In Parliament, however, there is not a noticeable number of members who seem enthusiastic in the cause, and the more practical observers say that the time for woman suffrage in England is still far off. At the Portman Rooms, every Monday, the campaigners have an "at home," where they greet their sympathizers and talk over their plans, for the social instinct of the feminine mind is not lost, even if the talk is mostly of votes and bills before Parliament. One of the influential members of the Union was recently in this country to urge the American woman suffragists to wage a more active campaign.

SHALL I KNOW MOTHER'S FACE?

BY IDA HINMAN, A.M.

THE one I love the best of all
Who dwell upon the earth,
Is she whom I delight to call
Queen of our home and hearth.
She taught my infant lips to speak
The name of God in prayer;
And daily his strong help to seek,
And trust his watchful care.
When we shall leave this world of pain
For better realms above,
Shall I know mother's face again
In that blest sphere of love?
It must be I shall know her there,
For that great light of God
Is illumined by a light more fair
Than is this earthly sod.
And surely my immortal sight
Will be at least as clear,
And my perception there as right
As is my vision here.
Yes, I shall know my mother's face
Among that throng in white;
And we'll together walk the place
Where Jesus is the light.
Yes, I shall know my mother there,
Her sweet face I shall see,
And we shall praise God for his care
Through all eternity.
And all our loved ones gone before
To that far shore so blest,
We'll know each other, as of yore,
In that sweet home of rest.
For all the ransomed hosts above
Shall know as they are known; [love,
And friends greet friends with words of
As they surround God's throne.

THE MARK OF CAIN

By Ellen Bertha Bradley

"DO not need any money at present," answered Howard. "I would like to leave it in your hands for a while, till—till—" he hesitated and his face crimsoned. "till— Oh, sir, there is something I ought to tell you and I do not know how!"

"Do not fear to tell me anything you wish," said Mr. Brown, kindly, but watching him with a keen eye.

"I want to ask you to do something for me. You are going away to-morrow. Could you find for me the address of S. S. Small, of Tacoma? I owe him for my ticket and want to pay him when I have earned enough."

"How is it that you have not his address? Have you lost it?"

"I have never had it. I do not know him. I cannot tell you all, but I was in a sore strait. I found the ticket on the sidewalk and used it, scarcely knowing what I did. I did not mean to steal it. It was in my mind all the time to pay for it. Oh, sir, do not think too harshly of me—" His voice broke.

The older man, remembering certain facts of his own youth, answered, pityingly:

"I think better of you than ever before. I have known all the time you were using a false name, but I thought perhaps you had bought the ticket of a seaman. Now I know that, whatever your trouble may be, you are honest at heart. How do you propose to send him the money when he is found?"

"By a bank draft, impersonal as to the sender, and a line stating that the ticket was found and used by a man in trouble, who asks forgiveness and returns the money with interest."

"Finding S. S. Small proved easy. Mr. Brown had hardly boarded his train, before the conductor asked him:

"Do you know anything about that young fellow who was with you on your last trip? He was traveling on a stolen ticket. At the next station after you left the train, I received a belated message to take it up."

"So!" said Mr. Brown. "Who did the ticket belong to?"

"To Sam Small of Tacoma. He is a big lumberman and travels this road nearly as often as you do. He is on the train now and was just asking me if I had heard anything of it."

"Introduce me, will you?" said Mr. Brown. "I would like to talk to him."

"The two men chatted a while together and Mr. Brown, having asked enough questions to assure himself that he was making no mistake, said:

"I have a commission to you. Your ticket was found by a young man who was a bit down and out and in a tight place. He has asked me to find you and pay you principal and interest."

"Interest be blowed!" exclaimed the astonished lumberman. "The ticket was fifty-one dollars and fifty cents."

"Mr. Brown counted out the money and handed a receipt drawn to himself, and so ended the ticket incident, except that when he handed Howard the receipt, he said:

"That was dead easy! Met the man on the train. If you would tell me the rest of your story, perhaps it could be as easily straightened out."

Howard sadly shook his head. For months his life went on with little incident.

Greater even than his anxiety for his relatives was that for the family of John Tracy, who, like himself, was charged with the support of a widowed mother. He finally thought out a scheme which he decided to risk. He did not send to his mother, lest her movements should be watched, but he would trust his pastor. In the fall, he asked for a few days' leave of absence, and drew from Mr. Brown what was due him.

A week later, John Tracy was summoned to the minister's study and asked: "What was absolutely the last you saw of Howard Graham? He disappeared on the night of your accident."

Had the two things any connection?"

Then, for the first time, John told the story as we already know it.

"You do not know of any reason for his going away? There was no business or other trouble?"

"Oh, no, sir. Howard was a clean fellow. He drank a little after that doctor fed him on whisky, but I think if that old woman had held her tongue, he would have pulled out all right. But," he added bitterly, "she told the truth. It might have been better if he had died."

"Perhaps not," answered the pastor. "God moves in a mysterious way." Read that," and he handed John a slip of paper.

It was a draft for two hundred dollars drawn to the Rev. Paul Forbes, issued by a bank in Montana to one in New York. John looked up inquiringly.

"Now read this," said the clergyman, and he handed him a slip on which was written with a typewriter: "Please cash and pay in equal parts to Mrs. Jane Tracy and Mrs. Mary Graham. Gen. 4: 13-15 inclusive. 'God be with you till we meet again.'"

The paper fell from John's hand. "From Howard!" he exclaimed. "I have always thought he believed he had killed me and ran away. What is that passage?"

The minister read from the Bible that lay open before him:

"And Cain said unto Jehovah, My punishment is greater than I can bear. Behold, thou hast driven me out this day from the face of the ground; and from thy face shall I be hid; and I shall be a fugitive and a wanderer on the earth; and it shall come to pass, that whosoever findeth me shall slay me. And Jehovah said unto him, Therefore whosoever slayeth Cain, vengeance shall be taken on him sevenfold. And Jehovah appointed a sign for Cain, lest any finding him should smite him."

"The poor boy! The poor boy!" said Mr. Forbes. "We must find him."

"Indeed we must," answered John. "This money must all go to his mother. It will be a great help to her for the winter; but to know that Howard is alive and thinks of them, will do them more good than the cash."

A letter was at once sent to the Western bank asking the name and address of the sender of the money. Word came back that the name was James Smith, address unknown. A letter to James Smith was sent to the care of the bank, but no one appeared to claim it. The remittances kept coming every few months, but always from a different town, and inquiry was always futile. Finding Howard was evidently not going to be easy. It was certain, however, that he was in Montana or Wyoming, and more or less guarded advertisements began to appear in the papers of the larger towns addressed to "Howard G—", of New York," and signed by John, Mrs. Graham or Sophie G—, begging him to come home or at least send his address.

None of these inquiries reached Howard's mountain sanctuary. Montana is not a prohibition State, but local prohibition was rigidly enforced on the Brown ranch. It would it have fared with any man who brought whisky there. Free from temptation and leading a healthy out-door life, Howard rapidly regained physical vigor. He soon became almost like a son in the Brown household. Thus things went on for a year. Then he astonished Mr. Brown by telling him that he had received an offer to do surveying on a railroad, which he thought it best to accept. The words were as a blow to the older man. He said quietly, "We shall be very sorry to lose you, but your talents certainly deserve a wider sphere."

"It is not that," said Howard. "I would rather stay here. It is very hard to think of going, but to be a wanderer is part of my punishment. I can never have home, wife or children. I am going away simply because I love your daughter Anna and may not ask her hand. After all your kindness to me I owe you this explanation. I am sure you will understand and see that I am right."

"To that I must answer both 'yes,' and 'no,'" replied Mr. Brown. "You are right if the cloud cannot be lifted from your life, but not if it can. I have watched you closely for a year, and found you the soul of honesty and uprightness. I do not believe you have committed any unpardonable sin. So far as I know you, I would gladly welcome you to my family; but, of course, I do not speak for Anna. I beg of you do not insist on longer being your own judge, and a second time going into exile. Tell me your trouble and let me see what can be done."

Again Howard sadly shook his head. The next week he joined the surveying corps.

CHAPTER V

HOWARD'S work in the surveying camp in the West was often dangerous, and when he had been a short time with the company he "won his spurs" by volunteering for an extra hazardous job, from which the bravest of the old hands shrank. It was necessary to take some measurements half way down a high cliff, and the only way to do it was to lower a man and his instruments from the top. This frequently happened, but in the present case there was unusual hazard.

"He has the real stuff in him," exclaimed the head surveyor as Howard coolly made the descent and proceeded to business. The work accomplished, he was drawn up and went to his other duties as if nothing unusual had happened. If he was the bravest in the camp, he was also the kindest. The young turned to him instinctively for help and counsel, and toward them he acted the part of an elder brother. In a lad named Joe, who carried chain for him, he took a special interest, and when Joe was taken down with fever, Howard took upon himself the care of the sufferer. Needless to say liquor was not part of the treatment. As the crisis approached, some of the men decided, from honest conviction, that the boy was being sacrificed to "crank notions," and one of them, named Fred, undertook to administer a dose. He slipped into the tent when Howard had stepped out on an errand, but the latter returned as the draught was put to the boy's lips and smashed the glass and the bottle.

"No more of that!" he said sternly. "He must take it. We will not have him die for your nonsense," was the hot reply.

"Git!" said Howard, pointing to the door. "Don't you or any other man try that again."

"But the boy will die," protested Fred. "He had better than to take that," answered Howard. "Somebody else will die, if you try to give it to him. You can be sure of that."

The man's eyes shone with admiration. "Well, boss," he said slowly, "we are not quite ready to spare you yet. Manage the kid your own way."

For a month he nursed the lad with almost a mother's tenderness and skill. The experience with typhoid had taught him many things beside the hatred of whisky. During the long days of convalescence they studied his Bible together, and when the lad left his sickbed, Howard had the satisfaction of knowing that he had won at least one soul for Christ.

The second spring after he joined the camp they were working on a switchback connected with a transcontinental line. The main track lay on a ledge below, on the edge of a deep gully. A mass of rock loosened by the spring freshets fell upon it. The men heard the thunder of its descent, and the whistle of a coming express. For an instant they stood aghast. Howard, snatching a red flag that was always on hand in case of emergency, sprang down the bluff in the almost hopeless attempt to warn the engineer. He ran forward to meet the train, which was hidden by a sharp curve. The engineer saw him and put on the brakes.

"What is the matter?" asked the conductor, coming forward to see why the cars stopped. The engineer pointed to the mass of rock a few feet ahead.

"That was a narrow call. How did you know?" asked the conductor.

"A man came straight down that cliff to warn us. I am afraid we went over him," was the husky answer.

But they had not. Howard had sprung aside, not a moment too soon, doing the only thing possible, leaping down into the gulch. His fall was broken by a clump of trees and they found him, unconscious but breathing. The conductor took a flask of whisky from his pocket and held it to his lips. His hand was grasped from behind and the voice of the man whom Howard had ordered from Joe's tent said:

"No, you don't."

"Why not?" asked the astonished conductor.

"He would not take it if he knew it. It shall not be given to him when he doesn't."

"Get out of my way, you fool! I'll attend to my own business," said the angry official.

"You'll not give that to him," retorted the other with his hand on his hip pocket. "One moment, please," said the cool voice of medical authority; and a physician—a passenger on the train—stepped between and leaned over the prostrate form. With an exclamation in which there was no vestige of professional calm, he tore open the shirt and listened to the heart.

"Thank God!" he cried as he found it strong. He turned to Fred. "You did well to stop that whisky," he said. "What made you do it? What do you know about this man?"

"I knew how he hated it. He threatened to shoot me once for trying to give some to a sick boy. And I think he would have done it, if I had persisted. Is he much hurt?"

"Can't tell yet. I hope not."

"Do you know him yourself, doctor? You kind of act like it."

"Yes, I used to know him well," was the answer, and he turned to superintend putting Howard on a stretcher. He was not seriously hurt. When he opened his eyes, he looked up at the gilded and enameled ceiling of a palace car. His eyes fell to the face of the physician bending over him, and his face lighted with unutterable joy as he exclaimed:

"John! John!"

"Yes, old fellow, it's John," was the answer. "Here is some one else who wants to see you. Let me introduce my wife." And Howard's sister's arms were round him and her kisses on his cheek. The young couple were taking their bridal trip to the West in the hope of getting some trace of him.

Joy is a quick restorer. In a short time Howard was able to travel and they went to the Brown ranch, where he was always a welcome visitor. Shep, the collie, bounded to meet them as he did on the day, three years before, when Howard had first come to the ranch. His bark brought the family to the door.

"It is Seth," exclaimed Mrs. Brown, "but who is with him?"

Howard, springing from his horse, said: "I have brought my sister and her husband to see you."

Mr. Brown, who was swinging the lady from her saddle, did not catch the words. "I'm Howard's sister," she said.

"I congratulate Howard," he answered, "but which of these gentlemen is he?"

Her answer was prevented by Mrs. Brown and the girls pressing forward in eager welcome. At the first pause, Howard introduced "Mr. and Mrs. John Tracy."

"If that one is John, I suppose this one is Howard," said Mr. Brown, dryly. "Would you mind, Mrs. Tracy, telling what his other name is?"

"Why, its Graham—Howard Graham. I thought you knew him." Then as she saw her brother's flushed and embarrassed face, she stopped, confused.

A Strange Migration

THE Norwegian lemming, or water-rat, is a native of the mountains of the Scandinavian peninsula. It multiplies with exceeding rapidity, so that the surplus population is compelled after a time to seek new feeding grounds. They descend the mountains in great numbers,

The Flight of the Lemmings to the Sea

ating up every green thing before them and finally reaching the sea. This, however, is no barrier to their determined onward march. They plunge into the water and strike out apparently for some new feeding ground, with the result that very few escape death.

During this march, which takes about three years, eagles, hawks and owls harass them from above; foxes and other animals attack them on all sides, while even the reindeer are said to join in the work of devastation. Thus thousands upon thousands of lemmings meet with violent deaths of one kind or another, and more fall by the way from the attacks of disease. Some remain along the route to form small new settlements, and in the succeeding spring and summer, numbers are found breeding in the coast districts, where they soon increase sufficiently to damage the vegetation.

Recalling Gough's Life*

MORE than ninety years ago, John Bartholomew Gough first saw the light in a small English town. His father was a soldier who had fought under Wellington in Spain and was in receipt of a pension of $100 a year from the British Government. His mother taught the village school. It was impossible to raise enough money to have John apprenticed, so when a neighbor, who was coming to America, offered for a small sum to take him along the father and mother reluctantly consented. The arrangement was not successful, for instead of sending the boy to school as they had promised, they kept him at the rudery of their farm in Oneida County, New York.

Eventually he escaped and trudged to New York City, where he obtained employment as errand boy in the Methodist Book Concern, with permission to work in the bindery when not otherwise employed. He succeeded so well that in a few years he felt justified in sending to England for his mother and sister, whom he ardently loved. For a little over a year the three had a peaceful, happy life, but at the end of that time Mrs. Gough died suddenly of apoplexy and her daughter obtained employment on Rhode Island. Left alone in New York Gough's condition went steadily downward. He lost one situation after another by dissipation and finally, hoping to rid himself of the drink habit, he went to sea. Enforced abstinence seemed to whet the appetite, and no sooner was he on shore than he began another debauch. He attempted to reform, and having persuaded a good girl to marry him, kept sober for a time, but soon fell lower than ever, and at last was seized with delirium tremens. His description of the tortures of that time is one of the most vivid passages of the English language, paralleling DeQuincey's famous confession.

It was not until 1842, when he was twenty-five years old, that the turning came. A waiter in a hotel in Worcester, Mass., Joel Stratton by name, encouraged him to believe that with Christ's help he might reform and took him to a temperance meeting, where he signed the pledge. Gough often spoke in after years of the kindness that came to him at that critical time. He was so shabby and dissipated that his old companions had deserted him, but his friend the waiter stood by him and brought men of good standing in the city to encourage him. Every evening one or other of the temperance people took charge of him, and took him to meetings where there was music and found new friends for him. Soon he began to speak at the temperance meetings, and out of a full heart eloquence was born. From that time until his death in 1886 his life was given to the temperance cause here and in Europe, and never has there been a more powerful and successful advocate.

"We will court-martial this naughty boy and inquire into all these things after supper," said Mrs. Brown, with ready tact. "Carrie, take Mrs. Tracy to your room to refresh herself. She must be very tired. Anna, come and help me."

Howard laid his hand on John's arm, and, turning to Mr. Brown, said:

"The dead is risen. Here he is."

In the house, the women quickly came to an understanding and a happy company soon gathered about the hospitable board. Anna alone was a little shy and distant.

"How about Lady Macbeth?" she cried. "You would not believe me. What do you think now? Then, bursting into tears, she threw herself into her mother's arms, sobbing:

"Why wouldn't he trust father? The poor boy! The poor boy!"

When, not many days later, Howard started on the happy journey home, he had received the promise of her hand.

Our story returns to its starting point. Again it is Sunday evening in the suburban church, and the eyes of the pastor are fixed on the young man who is leading the closing hymn: "God moves in a mysterious way." From the bronzed face every shade of weakness has vanished. The change without was but a sign of that within.

At the end of the service, the congregation almost forgot to welcome the returning bridal couple in the ovation they gave Howard.

As they left the church, the same two old ladies were talking.

"Howard sings as well as ever," said one.

"Yes," answered the other. "What a queer affair it was about his going away! They say he has turned out splendidly. This is a queer world anyhow. One can never tell how things will turn out."

The lady passed on, blandly unconscious of the share her gossip had had in the almost tragedy, which in the providence of God had become a triumph.

THE END

A Notable Anniversary

MR. AND MRS. VINCENT J. PAPPI, of 108 West Ninety-sixth Street, New York (many years subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD), celebrated their fiftieth wedding anniversary by a family reunion on March 12. They were married in Philadelphia on March 12, 1858. They have had five children, all of whom are married except one. All the sons and daughters, the sons-in-law and the daughters-in-law and all the grandchildren are alive and in good health and were at the anniversary. Mr. and Mrs. Pappi are members of the Scotch Presbyterian Church, and active in many of its societies. Rev. Dr. Wiley, the pastor, was present at the reunion and spoke. Many floral offerings were received from kind friends and numerous presents of a substantial character were also sent. In view of the fact that every member of the family, young and old, is living and enjoying the blessing of good health, the father and mother and their descendants feel that God has been specially gracious to them, and that they have reason for thankfulness for all his abundant mercies.

A "Home Comfort" Stove

Have you solved the "Home Comfort" problem for this coming summer?

Are you planning to put the coal range out of commission?

Will you do the family boiling, stewing and frying in a sane and restful manner over a stove that keeps the kitchen cool? The heat from the

is very powerful, but being concentrated at the opening on the top of the stove, all surface radiation (the cause of over-heating in a coal or wood stove) is avoided.

Thus, though the "New Perfection" Oil Stove is a wonderfully quick and easy cooker, kitchen discomfort is almost entirely eliminated by it. Nothing adds more to the pleasure of a summer at home than a "New Perfection" Oil Cook Stove in the kitchen. Made in three sizes, fully warranted. If not at your dealer's, write our nearest agency.

What Will You Give To Be Well

I CANNOT tell you how happy I am that I have been able to bring health and strength to 30,000 women in the past six years. Just think! This means a whole city. It is to my thorough study of anatomy, physiology and health principles, and to my 12 years personal experience before I began my instructions by mail, that I attribute my marvelous success. It would do your heart good to read the reports from my pupils—and I have done all this by simply studying Nature's laws adapted to the correction of each individual difficulty.

If vital organs or nerve centers are weak, I strengthen them so that each organ does its work. I want to help every woman to be perfectly, gloriously well, with that sweet, personal loveliness which health and a wholesome, graceful body gives—a cultured, self-reliant woman with a definite purpose, full of the health and vivacity which makes you

A Better Wife
A Rested Mother
A Sweeter

Sweetheart

You can easily remove the fat and it will stay removed. I have reduced 15,000 women.

Too Fleshly?

One pupil writes me: "Miss Cocroft, I have reduced 78 pounds and I look 15 years younger. I feel so well I want to shout! I never get out of breath now."

"When I began I was rheumatic and constipated, my heart was weak and my head dull, and oh dear, I am ashamed when I think how I used to look! I never dreamed it was all so easy. I thought I just had to be fat. I feel like stopping every fat woman I see and telling her of you."

I may need to strengthen your stomach, intestines and nerves first. A pupil who was thin, writes me: "I just can't tell you how happy I am. I am so proud of my neck and arms! My bust is rounded out and I have gained 28 pounds; it has come just where I wanted it and I carry myself like another woman."

"My old dresses look stylish on me now. I have not been constipated since my second lesson and I had taken something for years. My liver seems to be all right and I haven't a bit of indigestion any more, for I sleep like a baby and my nerves are so rested. I feel so well all the time."

Write me today telling me your faults in health or figure, and I will cheerfully tell you whether I can help you. I never treat a patient I cannot help. If I cannot help you I will refer you to the help you need.

A Corset is not Needed for a Good Figure

To Have Good Figure, Vibrant Health, Rested Nerves?

Arise To Your Best!

The day for drugging the system has passed. In the privacy of your own room, I strengthen the muscles and nerves of the vital organs, lungs and heart and start your blood to circulating as it did when you were a child. I teach you to breathe so that the blood is fully purified.

You Can Be Well Without Drugs

And the vital strength gained by a forceful circulation relieves you of such chronic ailments as Constipation, Torpid Liver, Indigestion, Rheumatism Weaknesses, Catarrh, Dullness, Irritability, Nervousness, Sleeplessness or Weak Nerves by strengthening whatever organs or nerves are weak.

I wish I could put sufficient emphasis into these words to make you realize that you do not need to be ill, but that you can be a buoyant, vivacious, attractive woman in return for just a few minutes' care each day in your own home.

A COURSE IN ESPERANTO

LESSON No. 7.—By Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

Commit to memory the following list of words, and then write them from memory. It will be a help to remember how many begin with a, with b, etc.:

Prepositions Ordinarily Used

al, to, towards apud, near, at the side of anstataŭ, instead of antaŭ, before, in front of ĉe, at ĉirkaŭ, about, around da, of (after words of number, weight, etc.)
de, of, from dum, during ekster, outside, besides el, from, out of en, in ĝis, up to, until inter, between, among kontraŭ, against, opposite to, facing krom, except, besides kun, with, in company with laŭ, according to malgraŭ, in spite of per, by means of po, by (with numbers), at the rate of por, for, in favor of, in order to (before infinitives) post, after preter, beyond pri, about, concerning pro, for the sake of, on account of sen, without sub, under super, above, over sur, on, upon, resting on, touching tra, through trans, across

Prepositions in Esperanto govern the nominative case, and not the objective, as in English, so that n is not added to the noun after a preposition. La infano kuras al la pordo, the child runs to the door. La pilko estas sub la tablo, the ball is under the table.

Every preposition has a fixed meaning. There is, therefore, no variation from the prepositions in the list given. They are always the same. There is, however, a choice to be made, according to logical connections. Do not say "Li batis lin kun bastono," but "per bastono." Do not say "Hundo estas per ŝi," but "kun ŝi." In English we use with, having differently understood meanings. The correct use of prepositions comes by practice, and by reading books in Esperanto. But there is a convenient je, which is indefinite, and may be used when one is at a loss to know what preposition to select.

Mi ploras je via perdo, I weep at your loss.

Exercise

La viro promenas (walks) al la domo. Vi donis al mi la libron anstataŭ la papero. La viro estas ĉe la pordo. La ĉevalo antaŭiras la vagonon. La ĝardeno estas apud la domo. La herbo estas ĉirkaŭ (not pri) la domo. La patro estas kun liaj filoj. La filino estas ekster (not krom) la domo. La hundo estas inter la ĉevaloj. La arbo estas kontraŭ la domo. Mi havas ses librojn krom tiuj ĉi (these). La suno brilas trans la herbo.

Let each member choose a preposition and then make a sentence in which it is used. Let the leader write sentences on the blackboard, leaving spaces for the members to put in prepositions.

Jesus at the Grave

By Mrs. M. Baxter

NEWS came to Jesus that "a certain man was sick, Lazarus of Bethany, of the village of Mary and her sister Martha." (R.V.) Is it a matter of interest to One so great as our God whether his children are sick or well? He answered, "He that toucheth you, toucheth the apple of his eye" (Zech. 13: 31; Matt. 10: 29-31). Thank God, with Him there is neither chance nor accident; His hand is arranging or overruling everything which happens. Mary and Martha were in the right when they sent Him the message, "Behold, Lord, he whom thou lovest is sick." The plea of the sisters was not the relation of Lazarus to the Lord Jesus, but the relation of Jesus to Lazarus—"He whom thou lovest."

The sisters began well. They took the position of loving confidence in Jesus. But it is just when we are most in the Spirit, that God permits us to be most tried, so that our faith may be kept in exercise, and that we may gain deeper acquaintance with God. The only answer of Jesus (perhaps it was spoken as much for the sake of the disciples who were present as for the sake of the two sisters, who were absent), was this, "His sickness is not unto death, but for the glory of God, that the Son of God might be glorified thereby."

This was the Word of God, part of that Word which shall stand when heaven and earth shall pass away, part of that Word of which Jesus said, "The words which I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life" (John 6: 63). How, then, should this word have been received? One of the sisters to whom this message was sent knew more of Jesus than any one of his twelve disciples: Mary . . . sat at Jesus' feet and heard his word" (Luke 10: 39). We are expressly told, "It was that Mary which anointed the Lord with ointment, and wiped his feet with her hair, whose brother Lazarus was sick." Jesus said of his anointing, "She hath done what she could; she hath anointed my body beforehand for the burying" (Mark 14: 8, R.V.). Mary had learnt what no other disciple believed as yet—that Jesus must die. Therefore Mary's faith must be put to a stronger test than that of others.

"Now Jesus loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus. When he had heard, therefore, that he was sick, he abode two days still in the same place where he was." To human ideas, this sounds strange. Many would have expected it would be written, "Because Jesus loved this family, he waited not a moment, but hasted with all speed to Bethany." Human love brings us down to the level of the sufferer or the tried one, to sympathize with him in his trial. But Jesus comes down to take us right out of the trial or suffering, and he takes the way whereby the end which he has in view from the beginning shall be secured. Because Jesus loved Lazarus, he did not leave him at once, because he loved Mary and Martha, he did not immediately appear upon the scene. Because he loves us, tried child of God, he lets things go to the very extreme, to see if thou wilt trust him still.

"Then after that, saith he to his disciples, Let us go into Judea again." The disciples, who were slow learners in the line of faith, said, "Master, the Jews lately sought to stone thee, and goest thou thither again?" Oh, how little they understood their Lord! He had been teaching them that he laid down his life for the sheep, that no man took it from him, but he laid it down of himself, that he had power to lay it down and to take it again; and yet they suggested to him fear for the safety of his life, as a reason why he should not go into Judea! Oh, how far was he above the circumstances, above the Jews—"In him was life!" He answered them, "Are there not twelve hours in the day?" It had been his Father's will that he should not immediately heal Lazarus, and that he should not, during those two days, venture into Judea. We cannot run any risk in doing the will of God; danger is not danger when the Shepherd is on before, and we are simply, obediently and trustfully following after him.

Family Worship — Day by Day

Value of Family Prayer

"Family prayer is an institution of priceless value where it is kept up conscientiously, seriously, regularly, and where it is endorsed by domestic administration and personal example. Where it is a part of a steady and genuine life, and not performed perfunctorily, it is full of power. The memory of it goes through life, hallowing every thought of home, reminding the wanderer of the days of innocence and devotion, and alluring him again to Christ, who was so long enshrined in the family circle. May the truth and the teaching presented in this volume find living administration and enforcement in the homes of its readers."

The Mountain City of La Paz

The Inca Mines of Tilcahuano

ON THE RIM OF THE WORLD

A Journey Through the Andean Highlands to La Paz, Bolivia, the Highest Capital on the Globe

By CHARLES M. PEPPER

THERE are some advantages of getting into Bolivia by way of the Peruvian port of Mollendo. Among these is the ride of more than three hundred miles from the seacoast on a railway which has many remarkable engineering features, and which crosses the volcanic range of the Andes at an elevation of 14,655 feet. Another advantage is in taking the little steamer across Lake Titicaca and enjoying the sensation of having navigated the highest body of water in the world on which steam vessels ply, for Lake Titicaca is only a fraction less than two and one-quarter miles above the level of the sea.

Voyaging across Lake Titicaca is peculiar in one respect, for it is possible to have two kinds of seasickness. When the winds blow strongly, as often happens, the little steam craft are tossed about like chips, and some of the passengers feel as badly as if they were in the big ocean. But there are other times when the lake is calm, yet some of the travelers become very ill. This is the saroché, or "mountain sea-sickness," which is said to be peculiar to the upper altitudes of the Andes. Its victims suffer from nausea and intense pains in the head. The last time I crossed there were three persons in a state of complete collapse from saroché, and, as it turned out, all of them were natives. The malady, in fact, is as common among natives as among foreigners or chance travelers.

The boats usually leave Puno on the Peruvian side of the lake at night, and in the morning the Bolivian Andes are in sight. The finest of these is the giant snow-crowned summit of Sorata, which can be seen when the skies are clear. There are many sights at closer view, small islands in the middle of the lake, which from a distance appear like huge turtles nicely balanced, and clusters of mud cabins on the hillsides. These seem too barren for cultivation, but the inhabitants manage to raise some vegetables, and barley and alfalfa, while they also pasture sheep and cattle.

Guaqui, the Bolivian port, is reached before noon. It has become quite a town because of the great increase in trade through the building of the railway. The population has been swelled by the Americans and other foreigners, who superintend the works. The railway from Guaqui to La Paz is a comfortable one. It runs across a great tableland with easy up-grades.

It is interesting for the tourist who is seeking Inca ruins to learn that he can look out of the car window and see some of the evidences of that marvelous civilization which the Spanish conquerors so remorselessly stamped out. The ruins of Tilcahuano, as remarkable as those of Cuzco, are not far away, and the Indians who may be seen from the train or pictured among these ruins have not changed much since the time of the Incas. Right along the railway track there are pillars and columns standing, which are covered with the inscriptions made centuries ago, and which are now deciphered and translated by the archeologists.

It will surprise many persons who know of Bolivia only as one of the South American republics which are shut in between the great Cordilleras of the Andes, and which is noted for its mines, to learn that, high up as is the great central plateau, this region is something of a "farming country." Since in this section there is a rainy season, sometimes it is literally farming among the clouds; at other times it is farming above the clouds, because these lie in great banks of fleecy vapors far down the mountain slopes, but do not rise and spread over the plateau or pampa. The soil is thin and stony, and at this height—13,000 to 13,500 feet—it might be thought that, even though Bolivia is in the tropics, no crops could be grown; but the natives manage to cultivate barley, potatoes and quinua. The latter is a cereal with a small grain like rice and grows about three feet high. It was the food of the natives in the time of the Incas and is still their chief staple. Potatoes also were cultivated in the era of the Incas, and it was from the Andes region of South America that the potato was introduced into Europe.

Though means of transportation are being constantly improved, the llamas, which were the sole beasts of burden known at the time of the Spanish conquest, are still the main reliance for freighting, and they will never be done away with entirely. Eighty pounds is the average burden, though sometimes a llama will carry one hundred pounds. If the cargo is too heavy the animal simply kneels down and refuses to move. No one but a native can

OUR INFIRMITIES

TEXT—Matthew 8:17

"Himself took our infirmities, and bare our sicknesses"

It is the sunset behind the hills of Galilee. Mount Tabor is all aglow upon its western slope, and its eastern side is the deep green and blue of the twilight hour. The Lake of Gennesaret is as smooth as the polished surface of that sea of glass which we shall behold in another world, and out upon the surface of the lake lie the great cones of the hills in shadow, in the quiet of the evening. Over the lake upon the eastern side those masses of rock are all burnished in the splendor of the sun's departing ray. It is the Sabbath evening. The little city of Capernaum grows quiet after evening prayer. Suddenly from the parapet of the spacious synagogue the trumpet in the lips of the priest blows the three blasts which indicate that the Sabbath is done. It is Saturday as we would call it, at sunset, and the Jewish Sabbath hours are over.

Now, then, the people begin to file through the streets, every herdsman from the hills bringing his sick, every cottager bringing his infirm, every father with a child who is ill, every child with a sire who is decrepit; and they all crowd the little dooryard of the Apostle Peter, their neighbor. It makes one think to read it of the scenes which we have occasionally witnessed in the anteroom of some famous physician in our time, where patients wait so long and pay so high for some slight notice of the great man and his cure.

The Good Physician

If I could make that scene live again in your mind it would be the most useful hour's work that I have ever done in the pulpit. I never read that story but I lament that it is not in my power to paint skilfully with words. But you can do it. Every one of you is poet enough for that. With your own imagination you can reproduce the scene. Here the bundle of the rags of the poor invalid; here the rich palanquin, silk and damask, of some opulent invalid; here the little half-starved babe with the marasmus, pushed out in the arms of its mother, wailing and fretting in the ears of the Saviour of the world. Here an old man going through the motions of casting ashes upon his bald pate as a sign of the hopelessness of his case. Here crutches, staves, bandages; here swathings. There—under that sycamore—he is dead, and they who brought him cover him over now, and yet wait a little in hopes that something may be done even for the dead; but there he lies, stark under the winding sheet.

And now before all this company in the faded glow, because the sun is gone, comes forth the Saviour, whose most beneficent title, save one, is the Good Physician. He stands upon the threshold of the dwelling, gazes out upon this group. Immediately the work begins. There is no feeling of any pulse, no looking at any tongue; there is no asking after any symptoms. He speaks, and that child goes to sleep in the mother's arms, and she sobs her gratitude as she kisses him. He speaks, and that old man, whose creaking joints have not lifted him from his couch for years, limber and lubricate like a lad's, springs up and draws a breath of gratitude. He speaks, and they cast down their crutches and gaze upon them with wonder that they ever used them. He speaks, and they who had not heard a voice for years, listen to the hum of human speech about them. He speaks, and they who had not seen, peer out upon the world and wish the sun had halted that they might linger a little longer on the thrilling aspect of the day which is come back after so many years of rayless night. He speaks, and there is none who is not cured save that dead man.

Miracles of Healing

And it is recorded that the dead were made alive. He speaks, and under that winding-sheet there is a motion as if hands were moving; the cerement is cast off; those bandages which held jaw to jaw snap, and the sheeted dead stands pale and wondering, and rubbing its eyes and looking into the faces of its neighbors! Oh, such a scene! A man may take that story that is written in the eighth chapter of Matthew, and as he sits down and reads it and dwells on the details they will bring tears to his eyes. It ought to be read syllable by syllable, with the locked door of your room keeping the world away, with your imaginative powers at their utmost activity. No wonder it has lived and been told at last in the remotest hamlet of the world in this generation, the latest of time.

Why did Jesus Christ perform healing miracles? For four reasons. Hold down the thumb and hold up the four fingers. He performed miracles, first of all to reveal unto us that our Heavenly Father was kind, beneficent and loving, not indifferent to our sorrows of the flesh. He performed miracles, secondly, because his own heart could not be denied this privilege of curing the sufferings of humanity for the sake of curing them, since, if he would, he could. He performed miracles again, because his miracles authenticated him as one with that beneficent Father. As no other man had ever done such, so no other man had made claims that he had, and his deeds, his works authenticated him. He performed miracles, last, because they were to be an illustration of the cure of the sin-sick soul, which he had equal power to effect with these cures upon men's bodies.

The Infirmities of Age

Let us look in that line at these miracles, therefore, at this hour—our infirmities. There is much said in the Scripture about the infirmities of our flesh. The Holy Spirit helpeth our infirmities. Here in the text, it is declared, he cured, or took away, our infirmities. What are infirmities? Undoubtedly, first and literally, they are maladies of our bodies. All diseases may not perhaps with propriety be called infirmities, and yet all infirmities are more or less diseases with us. We use the word infirmities largely to indicate something else from a sickness. An infirmity is a chronic difficulty; an infirmity is a weakness; an infirmity is a failing and enfeeblement somewhere. One man's infirmity is in his lungs; he cannot live upon the rugged coast of New England, and so he must nurse his infirmity and go to Colorado. Another man's infirmity is in his nervous system, and he has to be very careful that he does not overstrain it, and as long as he keeps himself within temperate lines he lives, and if he oversteps them he goes down. One man's infirmity is of the eye, and so of other parts of the system.

Infirmities may not kill; but when one dies, it is the infirmity after all which is like the open door through which death came. A tree may commence to die at the top, or it may decay at its heart and so be felled to the dust. It may, however, stand long with a rotten core, and be struck by lightning or broken by the storm at last; but when the old tree is toppled down by the wind or lightning, you will notice it was the infirmity that caused the fall; the girdling of the boy's jack-knife, the rotting out of the internal economy of the tree; and the stroke of the lightning was but the incident of its fall. I suppose that almost every one of us, by the time we get to be fifty years of age, at least, knows the infirmity which will be the open door for death, unless we happen to be upon some railroad that dumps us through a broken bridge.

Infirmities of Character

Now, this is the illustration of the thing which I wish to talk about—an infirmity, a moral or spiritual weakness. I do not say it is our only fault, I do not say it is to be palliated, but it is pitiable, and because it is pitiable I wish to speak a kind word about your infirmities. One man's infirmity is a testy temper; he gets angry at a flash. This very last week he lost one of the very best customers that ever crossed the threshold of his store; because of some infelicitous circumstances he lost control and let fly, and so a profitable buyer is gone forever. Almost all the mishaps and drawbacks of his life are the result of this infirmity. Because he made a hasty reply when he was about twenty-five he lost the situation whose line of promotion was to have developed into a partnership in the firm; so he was out of the line of success for eight years. His hasty temper has often grieved his good wife, astonished his children; has often led to soreness between him and his friends.

In some moment of quick temper he has struck a blow which he will never forget as long as he remembers anything concerning this world. He sometimes hopes he is getting over it, and he will go for five or six months without "getting mad," as he says, but then there will arise some circumstance of his daily life which irritates and exasperates him, and before he knows it he has yielded to the rush of passion, and goes out wishing he could kick himself every step of the way home, because he has been "an old fool again," he says. He does not call himself a bad man—but that infirmity! I know he is not the worst of men; but if you have a trouble with the eye, it may extend to the nose, to the fauces, to the brain. You never can tell where the infirmity is going to end. The difficulty with him who gets angry quickly is an infirmity of self-respect. Doubtless that is the real matter—a weakness of self-respect that does not abide at all times; that makes him weak of the affections; weak in association with his fellow men; injures his judgment. A famous psychologist has recently told us that every time a man gets downright angry he has so shocked his nervous system that he has shortened his days, that all the organs of the physical being have been hurt by it more than by a hard day's work. What if it were true, my friend, that this infirmity of yours could be taken away? It is true. That is one of the triumphs of the Christian religion.

Another man's infirmity is the blunting of the moral sense. He does not realize vividly the Ten Commandments as he once did. He can color the truth now, and not feel it as twenty-five years ago. He can swear occasionally a profane oath and not realize or appreciate it as ten years ago. He does not see distinct lines between meum and tuum, mine and thine, as he did ten years ago. Only a few days ago, he was in the Board, and when they all sat around the table talking about some property that was owned in Boston, and New York, and Chicago, and Philadelphia, and Baltimore, and a dubious proposition was made about the property, one clean-faced, pure, tender, conscientious gentleman protested that the proposed measures were essentially immoral; and this man bit his lip and said within himself, "I declare, I haven't thought in as high a line of morals as that man talked to-day for twenty years! I was brought up that way; used to think that way; but I have lost the moral sense. It is not as keen as it once was." You can trace the most of the failures of that man's life to the blunting of his moral sense. That is his infirmity. That is why he associates with men of a debased character, and does not see that it is hurting him; that is why he becomes indifferent to the Lord's Day; that is why he grows indifferent to the worship of God's house; that is why he is not yet a Christian.

The Master's Mission

An infirmity we get used to, and we do not take alarm until we behold the danger imminent. Do you see that gentleman, about thirty-two or three years of age? This last week he went down to the physician's office, and walked in and held out his hand like this, and said, "Doctor, that right hand, with the pen in it, earns me five thousand dollars a year; I am an accountant. But, doctor, I wish you would see what is the matter with my hand and fingers. Have I got the scrivener's palsy?" The doctor asks, "How long have you had it like that?" "Oh, I have had it for a good while, more or less. I have had a calcareous enlargement of one of the joints in my foot, but I did not think anything about the rheumatism in my foot, for my shoe covers it. But my hand, everything depends upon it. Can you cure me?" Men will carry a moral infirmity for a good while, so long as its indulgence is confined to a holiday hour, so long as it does not interfere with their credit and standing in the community, and the love and fellowship of their household and friends; but after a while, when they wake up to observe that their best friends begin to notice it, that the members of the firm are remarking it, that they themselves are willing to descend to all sorts of mean subterfuges for its indulgence, that they have locked horns with it and it is about to throw them, then they cry out, "My God, is it a hopeless case?" What, suppose that infirmity of yours could be taken away? I come to tell you to-night the old story of the Cross, that Jesus Christ was manifested to take away our peculiar weaknesses. The impression is that Jesus Christ takes away our pleasures, our happiness, our lawful gratifications, our zest for life. No. He takes away our decrepitudes, our weakness, our senility, our foolishness, our puerility, and the qualities we ought to be glad to spare. That is the mission of our Master.

The Knock at the Door

There are two ways in which a dwelling may be cleared. Up the front steps goes the sheriff, walking in the main hall, standing in the great doors of the palace, with the writ of ejectment, or a chattel mortgage. Down the lower step, around the corner, goes the sweet-eyed little girl, with her face chiseled out by poverty, and takes out of the house the scraps, festering pieces, the things that would make defilement in the dwelling, and poison human life. That sheriff is the law; that little messenger of mercy is doing the work that is done by Jesus Christ, and he was greatly humiliated. It is the law and the penalty which take away from the sinner his happiness. At length they arrest him, foreclose the mortgage.

It is Jesus Christ who stands at the door and knocks, and says, "Have you any pains here?" "What, do you take away pains?" "Yea, pains." "Why, yes, we can load you up at this number." It is Jesus who says, "Have you any offenses here?" "What, do you take offenses?" "Yea, offenses." "My brother and I have a quarrel." "Yea, the chastisement of your peace is

PHILADELPHIA'S GREAT REVIVAL

THE Simultaneous Revival Campaign is stirring the city of Philadelphia as it has rarely been moved before. The leaders, Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman and Mr. Charles M. Alexander, will be assisted before the campaign concludes by about twenty-five evangelists and Gospel singers. Nearly 300 churches have united in the effort, and it is estimated that there are 5,000 personal workers, besides 5,000 Gospel singers in the district choirs. The city has been divided into forty-seven districts, and meetings are held nightly in twenty-one churches. In addition to these, special meetings are held daily in theatres, factories and saloons.

The most thrilling meeting of the Philadelphia campaign thus far was a gathering for men only, held on Sunday afternoon in the Garrick Theatre. The building was packed, and it is estimated that a thousand were unable to obtain admission. During the song service conducted by Mr. Alexander, the men were deeply moved by the song, "My Saviour's Love," the chorus of which runs as follows:

How marvelous, how wonderful!
And my song shall ever be,
How marvelous, how wonderful
Is my Saviour's love for me.

After Paul Gilbert, the soloist, who was with Mr. Alexander throughout the London campaign, had sung two verses of this hymn, Mr. Alexander said he wanted to tell the men one of the most touching stories of sacrifice he had ever heard. He said:

"At a small mission station in Africa just before Christmas, the natives who had accepted Christ, instead of presenting each other with Christmas presents, at the suggestion of the missionary planned to bring whatever money, vegetables, or other salable articles they could the night before Christmas, that the money might be used to send the Gospel to the islands near them, where many of their own race were still in the darkness of heathenism. The night came, and one after another they brought their packages forward. Among others was one little girl about twelve years old, poorly clad, who came forward and laid down in English money three shillings and sixpence (that is, eighty-four cents in American money). The missionary was greatly surprised at the money she laid down. He knew that this meant a fortune in that country. After the gathering was dismissed, she stepped up to the little girl and asked her how she had secured so much money. She said: 'I knew that this evening they would all be bringing their presents to Jesus, and I had nothing to bring. I found out that a man wanted a slave girl, and I went and sold myself to him for life as a slave.' She said: 'I could do nothing less than this, when Jesus did so much for me. I had nothing to give but myself and I gladly gave it. Jesus gave himself for me.'"

As the Gospel singer finished the story, tears were rolling down scores of faces throughout the audience. In the course of a noonday address to business men last Tuesday at the Garrick Theatre, Dr. Chapman said that, if we are to have power of prayer, we must be right with God. He said: "Every revival in the history of the world was born with prayer. The revival of 1857 began with one man on his knees. The revival of 1800 began with a single man praying all the night through, and there are enough people in this noonday meeting, not only to shake Philadelphia, but to move this country, and to take the world. The hour is come to pray. But there is only one man to pray, and that is the man who is right."

A Gospel Meeting at Cramp's Shipyard

"They tell a story of Professor Stuart Blackie, of the University of Edinburgh, hearing a class. One man rose with his book in the wrong hand. He began an explanation, and the professor thundered, 'Take your book in your right hand and be seated.' The student held up his right arm and it was off at the wrist. The Scotch students hissed the professor. The great man hesitated a moment, then he went to the student and put his arm around him, and with tears streaming from his eyes, said: 'I never knew about it. You will forgive me?' It ended in the conversion of that young man."

"I told the story at a Bible conference, and after the meeting a man came forward, and raising up his right arm, it ended at the wrist. He said: 'I am the man. Professor Blackie led me to Christ, but he never would have done it if he had not put his arm around me and made the wrong right.'"

In Philadelphia homes, in shops, factories and on the streets men, women and children are being approached about their souls' salvation. One evening Mr. Alexander spoke to a drunken man on the street, and he promised to attend the meeting. Two nights later he was present at Bethany, and was led to Christ by H. Wellington Wood, a prominent business man, who is one of the greatest soul winners in Philadelphia.

One night after the service at Bethany, as Mr. and Mrs. Alexander and Rev. W. P. Nicholson—who has come over from England to study the Simultaneous Mission—were going home, they met a man staggering along the street. Mr. Alexander spoke to him kindly, asking the man whether he did not have a good Christian mother. The man replied that he had had one of the best Christian mothers that ever lived. The man sobered down, and expressed anxiety about his eternal welfare. Mr. Alexander suggested that they kneel down right there in the street and have prayer together. Not only did the Gospel singer kneel with the drunken man, but his wife and Mr. Nicholson knelt as well. Mrs. Alexander first prayed touchingly for the man, and then in a broken, contrite manner, the man prayed for himself, calling upon God to be merciful to him a sinner. While this was going on, a crowd of those who had been at the evening service had gathered and Mr. Alexander asked them also to pray for the man, who had thus been suddenly met. It was learned afterwards that a policeman had been following the man, but left him when he saw him in the care of the evangelists.

OUR INFIRMITIES

upon me, and with my stripes ye are healed." At the next door, "Have you any sorrows here? Have you any angers here? Have you any bad habits here? Have you any cumbersome old burdens, miseries, needs? Have you any loss of the joy of life here? Have you any wretchedness here?" "Yea, Lord; dost thou come for these?" "For these." "What dost thou do with them, O Christ?" "Wash them in my blood until they are white as wool, and bring them back to invest him whom I have helped of his sorrows."

Oh, will you not believe him? The old story of the Cross of Christ, that he took away the things we must needs spare if we are to live a happy life. He taketh away our infirmities.

It was once my duty to go to a dwelling where there was an imbecile child, to perform the ceremony of marriage. Bands of music were in the atrium; beautiful adornments of flowers were in the stairways and chambers; one chamber was set apart for such a load of costly presents. At the last moment, as the bride, blushing and beautiful, turned upon the doorstep, and was about to depart, she came back, flew up the stairs, bent over the cradle where lay the babe eleven years old and kissed him last, and turned and went out on her way. Stay, bride, would you take his place? You loved him; you gave him the last kiss. It was very beautiful; it was charming. Would you take his imbecility of mind? "Oh, no!" Christ did.

Who of you would take the deaf ear of your brother? It is one thing to talk about mercy. Who of you would take the blind eyes of your dearest friend? One day last week, I went over and stood in the Blind Asylum in another part of the city. I saw the little lads who drew around about me so happy, until I caught a glimpse of their eyes, and all of them had the marks of this terrible destruction that had crossed their sight. I declare I could have wept. I almost did. It seemed to me I could not endure that place; and I will never go there again unless I can go to do some deed of mercy. But is there a father who suffers such sorrow as to look upon one of these bright lads with all the health in the world except those terrible eyes, and is there one of them loving him ever so much who will say, "My son, I am getting to be sixty-five. You are the babe of my old age. I cannot live much longer. Here, if it be the will of God, give me those wrecks in front of your brain and take my sound orbs." Would a man do that? Jesus did. He was made a curse for us. He hung upon the tree for us. He was counted sin, who himself knew no sin, for us. He closed his eyes for us. He sits upon the throne of glory to-night, and he says, "Give me your pride; give me your greed; give me your animalism; give me your guilt. I will take your place. I did take your place." Only a God could say that.

Society is very hard on an infirmity. Here comes a school-teacher presenting himself to the committee.

They say, "We hear, sir, since we saw you last, that you are subject to epilepsy, the falling sickness." "Who told you?" "We have inquired about you, and we understand that you have had an attack or two of epilepsy." "It is true that three or four years ago, I had an attack or so; but I have lived without it for three or four years. I am skilful in my vocation; I can give you satisfaction. Don't you think you had better give me the chance, and save the good there is in me?" "We must have a sound man. It is a terrible malady. They say one never gets over it; we couldn't employ you."

When I was a boy in our village in Vermont, when they were enlisting men, there was a shoemaker, I knew him well, who had a crooked arm. He went up to the doctor and said, "I will give you all the money I have in the bank—I will give you five hundred dollars if you will straighten my arm." The doctor laughed and said, "Why, if I could straighten your arm, I could not make your hair brown." Then the Colonel turned to the old Crispin and said, "A man like you, loving his country so much, shall go. Come, and be my servant and attendant. And he went, crooked arm and all, white hair and all, and the Colonel took his infirmities (the Colonel came out of our town), and when that regiment was whittled down to a handful, the old shoemaker was seen in the thick of the fight doing valiant service for the cause.

THE FLEET ON ITS WORLD TOUR

Party of American Sailors Visiting Mt. Corcovado, Brazil

Admiral Evans Receiving a South American President

FOR several weeks the American battleship fleet has been anchored in Magdalena Bay, Lower California, and engaged in the regular spring target practice. The scores, so far as they have been made public, show that American gunnery ranks among the best in the world. Some of the ships fired their required number of rounds within a short time after their arrival.

To those at a distance the bombardment of the triangular targets was a fascinating spectacle. A target would be towed several thousand yards from the white hulls and anchored. It looked a mere speck of white away off on the wide expanse of dancing blue. Then there would come a flash from one of the turret guns, a thunderous report would come over the water, and a white cloud would hang for a moment above the turret. Away in the distance a shot would be kicking up spurts of water until it dived to its final resting-place near the target anchorage. Perhaps there would be two or three shots and then one would rip through the centre of the target, tearing it wide open from side to side, and leaving it unfit for service until taken back to the fleet and repaired.

Foreign observers regard the cruise as among the greatest in naval history. One dispatch from Berlin, Germany, says that it is the general idea there that what the fleet has done will place the American Navy on a high level in the world's opinion.

Although the fleet has gone almost to the California coast, it seems likely that another long journey will be taken before the cruise is called complete. It is reported from Washington that eighteen ships will sail from San Francisco about the sixth of July for Hawaii. After stopping at Honolulu the fleet will sail for Pago-Pago, Samoa. Then they will undoubtedly go to the Philippines. Here the fleet once more will have several days of target practice. Very likely a run will be made up to Japan, and then over to the Chinese coast. Invitations for the fleet to visit several Eastern countries have been coming to our Department of State in rapid succession. Australia held enthusiastic meetings and wants the fleet to come to Melbourne. The premier, the governor-general and many official and private committees are at work to make it a memorable affair if the fleet should come.

Japan has made her invitation most cordial. The Americans will undoubtedly stay several days at Yokohama. China, a few days later, also urged that the fleet come to her shores. It is expected that the larger part of the fleet will go on through the Indian Ocean, up the Suez Canal, through the Mediterranean Sea, and across the Atlantic to our own shores. A world cruise by a fleet of modern battleships has never been thought possible abroad.

GOSPEL PROGRESS IN AWAKENED CHINA

OVER six years ago we commenced work here in Wuhu under the Advent Christian Mission, of Boston. We had then no established work here, and the field was a hard and trying one under normal circumstances; that year especially so, for it was the great An-Huei Province "flood year," and all the refugees of the flooded district were packed in Wuhu, suffering for want of food and clothing.

We had a small local fund to help; but it was as a drop in a bucket to relieve the need. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers came nobly to our help and fed over four thousand women and children in the soup kitchen for six months, and supplied the funds to keep about ten thousand men at work from early autumn until seed-sowing, supplying the seed also to begin farming again.

After the famine was over, we resumed our church work, and two years ago built a good substantial church, which now has a membership of sixty persons. While leveling off the site for the school and church, we had to excavate over twenty feet of hill. Over fifteen feet deep we unearthed an old tomb, seven feet high, eight feet wide and fifteen feet long. There was no sign of any bones, or even ashes, but we found a number of articles of interest, among others a ring, gold hair ornaments, a sword, a five-bowled candlestick and some brass "cash," made about the time of Christ. These things we want to present to some museum when we return to America.

Our church is conveniently located, and we have tried to make it a working church. These years we have trained young men to go forth to preach the Gospel to their own countrymen. We have now twelve of these men preaching and six more preparing for service. We want to heartily thank the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for what they have done in helping us spread the Gospel of the Kingdom. One lady reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sent out two years ago $100, which was enough to build a good schoolhouse at Chao Hsien; and last, but not least, Dr. Klopsch sent us enough money to buy a houseboat, and has kept it running ever since.

We were glad to see that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD had taken up the subject of "substitutes" on the mission field. This is a most effectual way of evangelization, and at the same time not expensive. The wages paid to native evangelists are about the same in all the missions, i. e., $5 to $6 gold per month; for Bible women from $3 to $4, and for students about $2. Almost every mission could furnish a list of available, earnest native workers, if called upon for this purpose.

They have also a preacher, who is a native of Laedie and owns his house and farm, being descended from a well-to-do family.

Before his conversion this same person was a man of strong temper and a heavy drinker, feared by many; but his whole life has since become so changed that his wife and mother were soon ready to accept his Lord as their own. He spent a year in study with the missionaries and became the preacher when the Laedie church was dedicated three years ago.

A Chinese Convert's Testimony

WHEN I entered the theological school, I was determined to be a true disciple of Christ. But daily I perceived that there was in my heart a spring of evil which troubled me. My heart was not willing to do evil; but this spring seemed with an irresistible force to drive me to it. I redoubled my efforts to overcome this but never succeeded for any great length of time. I thought to myself, "God sent Jesus for the special purpose of forgiving sins, but if he forgives sins and does not help us to keep from sinning, then the forgiveness is a lie. It is as if one daily took medicine and daily was sick. How could it be said that such a one was healed? If he cannot help me to keep from sinning, he is no Saviour and the Christian religion is no better than any other." I knew that Jesus promised to keep us from sin, and I knew that the promise was not yet fulfilled in me. I remembered that the way of salvation was written in the Bible, and I began both morning and evening to search it diligently, praying that the way might be made plain to me.

As I read and as I saw what my soul lacked, I knelt and prayed that this lack might be supplied; then I rose and read again, and again earnestly prayed. This method of reading and praying by turns I kept up for several months.

THE BOWERY MISSION BROTHERHOOD

THE name most frequently found upon the lips of Bowery Mission converts, nowadays, is "Brotherhood."

On the morning of Sunday, June 30, 1907, the superintendent gave an address on this subject, and, at the close of the service, a very unusual thing occurred. In giving the usual invitation, which prevails in Rescue Missions, he walked down the aisles of the Mission Hall and announced that he was prepared to offer the hand of brotherhood to any who were willing to enter into that relationship in the full sense of the word, as taught by Christ and the New Testament Scriptures.

He pointed out that the word had a very deep and significant meaning, and quoted Max Muller's statement that the world had no idea of brotherhood until Christ came into it. According to Christ's teachings, the duties and obligations of brotherhood were always mutual. In the Christian Brotherhood Circle, the individual's interest would always be subordinated to the interests of the whole. If men were prepared to enter such a circle on such conditions, he was there to formally but sincerely offer the hand of brotherhood.

A great many men at once responded, and were invited by the superintendent to meet him in the Mission on the same evening, half an hour before the evening service began. Thirty-one came, their names were taken down, and in this quiet way the Brotherhood of the Bowery Mission Converts was established.

Since that time the Brotherhood has met every evening, and Mr. Hallimond has been most assiduously helped in this work by Mr. Charles Balevre, the organist of the Mission. The meetings of the Brotherhood are of a most informal kind. Nothing in the shape of a set meeting is ever permitted, but in a natural, colloquial way, the men tell of their experiences during the day. They mostly talk on the subject of their search for employment; but other affairs come up in the conversation, and every man is made to feel that he has some kind of obligation towards every other man, and so the spirit of helpfulness has been wonderfully engendered.

During the time the Brotherhood has been in operation, the kitchen, in which the meetings are held, has been taxed to its full holding capacity, and the attendance of the members is only limited to the size of the room. The superintendent is delivering a course of talks to the Brotherhood on the Bible, and on the last Friday evening of the month, a social meeting is held. Men in the Bowery know so little of home life and comfort that they appreciate this one night in the month, when the Mission is made to them all that a Christian home can be. Music, story-telling and everything else that would be appropriate in a Christian home is permitted in these gatherings.

The Brotherhood meeting held on the afternoon of Christmas Day last was one that will never be forgotten by those that were present. They are still talking about it, and looking forward to next Christmas Day gathering. They are at present occupied in rehearsing carols for Easter Sunday, which is expected to be a time of great rejoicing.

Since June last over two thousand men have had their names enrolled on the Brotherhood's roll call.

How "Jimmy" Dodd Went Home

ABOUT two and one-half years ago, a young man, hatless and shoeless, his face showing the marks of dissipation, stumbled into the Bowery Mission. Before the service had progressed very far this man attracted attention. The testimonies of saved men, the kind words of the superintendent, the touching music of the organ, the loving tenderness of "Mother Bird," all affected him strangely. That night, before the services closed, a sinner repented, and earnestly asked God's help to keep and to save him thereafter.

James Dodd was born and brought up in a home of culture and refinement. He lived an honest, upright life until shortly after the death of his mother, when his step-father put the children out of his house in order that he might marry again. This was the beginning of James' downward career. Drink and gambling soon robbed him of what little money he had, and before long he was down on the Bowery, shunned by his former friends, a social outcast.

But the influence of a mother's prayers followed him even in his degradation, and won him back from sin. After that night's experience at the Bowery Mission not one drop of liquor ever passed his lips. At first the Mission managers gave him work in the kitchen. Then he became doorkeeper. He soon found work with a firm of range manufacturers in New York, and remained with them until his last illness. He died on March 17 in the Metropolitan Hospital, New York. Three days later, the men of the Bowery, who knew him well, were given the privilege of viewing the remains of their old friend. They came in crowds to pay their last tribute of respect to "Jimmy" Dodd.

At the funeral service in the Mission, Superintendent Hallimond spoke feelingly of "Jimmy's" conversion and his struggle to do right. There were few dry eyes in the hall even among the more hardened.

Later in the evening, the testimonies of the men who had known "Jimmy," and who had roomed in the Memorial House with him, tore at many a heart-string with their touching tributes to their dead comrade. Mr. John Long, probably better known to the men of the Bowery than any other man, told how "Jimmy" had carefully saved his earnings until he had enough to pay all of his hospital charges and even his funeral expenses.

Among those at the Mission that night was Mr. Dodd's foreman, who told how the rules had been broken in order to pay "Jimmy" more for the work he had done, so thorough and conscientious a workman had he been. All who knew "Jimmy" loved him and were inspired by his faith in God and his earnestness in the Christian life.

The coffin was covered with beautiful flowers from "Jimmy's" comrades in the Memorial House and from other friends. The men of the Bowery Mission were represented by a cross, while the kitchen-men with whom he had worked sent a great bunch of lilies. The service was one of the most impressive ever held in the Mission, and showed how deeply the spiritual struggle and triumph of one of their own number had influenced the lives of the men of the Bowery, thousands of whom are passing through a similar experience.

manage a drove of llamas. They look more intelligent than they are, yet they are very graceful animals, and a drove of them crossing the pampa presents an attractive sight. They seem to be going in all directions, but their Indian drivers manage to keep them headed one way, and they feed as they go along.

I have described some wonderful places in the Andes for the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, yet I don't think any of them can be compared to the city of La Paz, or "The City of Our Lady of Peace," as the early Spaniards called it. To travel in a comfortable railway train from Lake Titicaca, fifty-five miles across the pampa, and then to find yourself at what seems to be the rim of the world, to look over the rim and see clumps of trees, small green parks and flower gardens, a long tree-lined avenue, red-tiled and silvery-roofed houses, some with blue and red walls, and some of dull mud color; to see the towers and domes of churches and other structures; to note what seem to be crowds of two-legged ants moving through the streets; to view the droves of llamas and the donkeys, seemingly no larger than cats—this is what it is to receive the first impression of the city of La Paz from the Alto or Heights. The city lies in a great oval gulch, through which flows the Chuquiapu River, which is fed by some other small streams whose course is marked by narrow gullies. The Heights are 13,500 feet above sea level, and La Paz is about 1,500 feet lower. It is nevertheless the highest capital in the world, for Lhasa, the capital of Tibet, is less than 12,000 feet.

When I visited La Paz some years ago the stage coach brought me across the pampa and down the steep and crooked road with many sharp turns right into the heart of the city. Now the descent is made by means of an electric railway, and the trolley ride is also exhilarating. There are steep grades and loops, and in slowly making the turns there are some wonderful views of the heights above and the city below.

La Paz is changing its appearance somewhat, because of modern improvements, particularly new buildings, including the Government Palace or White House; but it is still a most picturesque capital, and the Aymara Indians, who form the bulk of the population, do not change their characteristics, which are so attractive to strangers.

Covet Not Wealth

NOW that the business excitement of the last few months has somewhat subsided, and the financial turmoil is followed by calmer and clearer weather, we can look back over the scene as one might view a storm-strawn beach and derive a profitable and timely lesson. It is the old, old lesson of the uncertainty of riches—the folly of trusting to wealth as a source of enduring satisfaction and happiness. Truly, as the sacred philosopher wrote, “riches make themselves wings.”

But there is to the Christian a supreme consolation amid all earthly losses. He knows that life is simply a school of experience, in which we are to search out and follow the divine will, as revealed to us through Jesus, and he knows that it is madness to waste his best energies in the race for riches. If we obey the Christly mandate to seek first the kingdom, we can safely leave the rest in God's hands, with the comforting assurance that a blessing will rest on our labor and all things needful to our existence here will be supplied.

To make wealth our main object in life is to grasp the shadow and miss the substance. Let us therefore not covet the riches of others, but strive to make the best of our own lot in life and envy none. He who makes the accumulation of money his chief object in life becomes a slave to his erstwhile servant; for there comes a time when the money takes the reins in hand and assumes the mastery. “Ye cannot serve God and mammon.”

Heathenism in India

NORTHERN India was the scene, a few weeks ago, of a remarkable religious festival in which over half a million men and women participated. By bathing in the yellow waters of the Ganges, these poor deluded souls believed, as their priests taught them, that they were washing away their sins and the sins of their ancestors, back to the earliest ages of the race. It was the Ardhodaya, or “Festival of Salvation,” and it occurs only about four times in a century. The word “Yog” means “combination,” and indicates that the stars must be in a certain favorable position at the precise date of the festival, otherwise no spiritual benefit will result. For this great occasion the native women dress in their costliest robes and bedeck themselves with gold and jewels. Arrayed in this finery, they enter the muddy river and, imploring the blessing of the black goddess Kali, submerge themselves in its waters. The men, also attired in their best, do likewise and the whole multitude—equal to the entire population of many a large American city—dip and flounder amid the clangor of bells, the sounding of conch shells and the beating of tom-toms. At the close of the festival, the great assembly disperses and the next day sees the river practically deserted.

This is sad picture of the heathenism which prevails throughout a large portion of India to-day. Multitudes are yet unenlightened and have never heard the Gospel proclaimed. Their worship of Kali, “goddess of a thousand names,” who slew a many-headed giant and danced with joy until she shook the foundations of the earth and until all the heathen gods begged her to stop, is still prevalent throughout Bengal. Her images are made and sold by the thousand. In Hindu mythology, she is characterized as a female Satan, sanguinary, brutal, drunken, who delights in offerings of the blood of tigers and men. All the professional criminals of India are her special devotees. It is demon-worship of the most pronounced character. There is perhaps no gloomier or more repellent impersonation in the whole range of mythology.

A century of missionary effort has done much for India; but the work that still remains is so great that Christian men and women in every land must recognize the need of increasing their efforts for its speedy evangelization. Enlightenment can come from no other source. The white man's civilization, while it admirably guarantees to subject races the free exercise of their own religion, by that very guarantee serves in many parts of the world to foster and perpetuate the worst forms of heathenism. It helps the material man, but is indifferent to the spiritual, and cares little or nothing for the great struggle now going on, not only in India, but in many missionary lands, between the powers of light and darkness. The glorious Gospel is the world's only hope. Through its convincing and converting power, the heathen racess will yet be made to realize that neither sacrifice to idols, nor bathing in the turbid waters of a river, but the blood of Christ alone can wash away sin.

The President's Message

ON March 25 President Roosevelt sent to Congress a special message which, both because of its brevity and the importance of its recommendations, received more than the ordinary popular attention. He urged upon that body immediate legislation on the following topics:

A bill should be passed forbidding child labor throughout the nation. A model child-labor law should be passed for the District of Columbia. It was unfortunate, the President stated, that in the one place solely dependent upon Congress for its legislation there should be no law whatever to protect children by forbidding or regulating their labor.

The re-enactment of an employer's liability law, so drawn as to conform to the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

To provide for compensation to employees of the Government for injuries or death incurred in its service.

The modification of injunction practice in labor disputes, so that no restraints be issued without due notice, the hearing for a permanent injunction to be heard by the court within a reasonable time and the settlement of the issue of contempt to be decided by another judge than the one issuing the injunction.

The Interstate Commerce Law should be amended so as to make railroad traffic agreements subject to the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, with the publication of all the details; also making it a duty of that body to pass upon the issuance of securities by railroads doing an interstate commerce business.

The Attorney-General should be empowered to appoint at least one of the receivers when a common carrier or other public utility is placed under a receivership.

The Anti-Trust Law should be amended so that there will be no further excuse for a construction so sweeping as to prohibit every combination for the doing of business. Combinations in the modern industrial world were absolutely necessary both among business men and laboring men, and they were becoming necessary among farmers. The substantive part of the present law should remain unchanged, that is, every contract in restraint of trade among the States and with foreign nations should be illegal; but the right of all to peaceful combination for all lawful purposes should be explicitly recognized. Nothing should be done to legalize either the blacklist or the boycott.

It was urgently necessary that there should be some action this session on the financial bills before both houses. Action should be taken to establish postal savings banks. They are needed for the benefit of the wage earner and the man of small means, and would be a valuable adjunct to the whole financial system.

The present Congress should provide for the collection of data for use in revising the tariff by the Congress elected next fall. The President said that there was one change in the tariff that could be made at once to the advantage of the country. The forests need protection, and one method of protecting them would be to put upon the free list wood pulp, with a corresponding reduction upon paper made from wood pulp, when it comes from any country that does not put an export duty upon it.

Finally, a permanent waterway commission should be created. “Congress should recognize the fact that the subject of the conservation of our natural resources with which this commission deals is literally vital for the future of the nation.” Numerous bills had been introduced, none of which give the Government the right to make a reasonable charge for the valuable privilege. He said he should be obliged to veto any measure that did not set a time limit and allow the collection of a reasonable charge.

It is expected that Congress will consider most of the foregoing recommendations during the present session.

The Affection of Animals

IN the movement for the legal abolition of vivisection, our dumb friends are finding warm and enthusiastic advocates of their claims on humanity. So many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have written us on the subject that we are compelled to regard the movement as one that is rapidly extending throughout the country.

One of the most effective arguments we have yet met, against the brutal treatment of the lower animals, was recently related by a physician, himself an ardent vivisectionist. He said:

“Some time ago, I got a little dog from a friend. He was a mongrel of no particular breed. I had heard so much about a dog's affection for its master that I resolved to test the matter for myself, so I treated the little animal very kindly. As the weeks passed, his demonstrations of affection became very marked. He would run up to me, leaping, barking and wagging his tail when I entered the house, his eyes fairly dancing with excitement; nor would he be satisfied until I had patted him on the head and he had licked my hand. He was a nice, cute little fellow, and I grew to like him amazingly; so much so that, when the time arrived for making the test in question, I rather regretted it.

“Well, first I cut off his tail, fixed up the wound properly, and then waited. There was no apparent abatement of his affection towards me, for almost as soon as I had finished with the bandage, he was licking my hand and fussing over it. Next, both ears were sacrificed in the interest of science, but still no diminution. Then one of his hind feet was lopped off and even that did not make the slightest difference. He would still stump around after me as eagerly as before, bark as joyously and lick my hand just as fondly as ever. I had never thought such affection could be shown by an animal. One foot after another was taken off. Now, thought I, he will certainly regard me as an enemy; but he did not. The little fellow, to the last, showed his love for me, so that I grew to be heartily ashamed of myself.”

This dog died “in the interest of science” some time afterward. It would be difficult, in the whole range of animal history, to find a more touching and convincing proof than this, of the love and fidelity of man's faithful friend for his master, no matter how brutal, inexcusable, or monstrous the latter may be in his conduct toward him. We commend the story to the supporters of vivisection, and trust that it may not be without its effect.

Among the Workers

—MISSIONARY C. C. VINTON, of Seoul, Korea, writes: “Our girls' school here is doing a fine work for nearly fifty pupils, but the appropriation for its use is much too small.”

—MRS. JOSEPH MIZELL, Superintendent Woman's Home Mission Society, Tampa, Fla., is conducting a relief work in aid of the Cuban Mission, which has been a severe sufferer by the late disastrous conflagration in Tampa.

—MISSIONARY A. R. STARK, of Callao, writes from Colon: “At Sabanilla, Colombia, we had the pleasure of greeting the missionaries of the American Presbyterian Mission. They report a very successful year's work and encouraging increase of membership.”

—ST. AUGUSTINE, FLA., was stirred greatly by a revival during three weeks in February. The evangelist was Rev. B. J. Phillips, of Macon, Ga., assisted by Rev. M. E. Jackson, of the Ancient City Baptist Church, and Rev. J. H. Martin, of Grace Methodist Church. Many made public confession of Christ.

—WILLIAM R. BRADSHAW, Pacific Coast Field Secretary of the Commercial Travelers' Christian Association, writes from San Francisco: “We start an evangelistic campaign for fifteen days under the leadership of Melvin E. Trotter, of Grand Rapids, Mich. Pray for us in San Francisco, that God will marvelously bless our sin-steeped city.”

—IN THE UNION Tabernacle meetings of all the churches of Shenandoah, Ia., where evangelists Hart and Magann, of Fairbury, Ill., recently conducted services, there were some 6,000 people in attendance one Sunday and more than 130 who definitely accepted Christ during the day, mostly men. The city and surrounding community were greatly stirred.

—MORE THAN 1,000 CONVERSIONS, a majority young men, is one of the results of the notable evangelistic campaign just closed at Mount Vernon, O. Rev. Milford H. Lyon, of Wheaton, Ill., led the movement. A chorus of 300 singers, led by Mr. Clifton Powers, proved a great attraction. Special meetings were held for business men, for factory workers and for high school students. During the month, Mr. Lyon spoke nearly 70 times. A tabernacle seating nearly 3,000 was built expressly for the meetings. The entire expense, including a generous offering for the evangelist, was raised by collections.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

A Prince's Wedding

SELDOM has a wedding not of royal rank brought together so many distinguished personages as that recently solemnized in the city of Coburg. The bride was the Princess Eleanor of Reuss-Kostritz and the bridegroom Prince Ferdinand of Bulgaria. Neither of them can boast of their youth, for the Prince is in his forty-eighth year and his bride is a year older. Their family connections, however, are so numerous and occupy positions so illustrious in the estimation of their countrymen as to render the union a matter of interest in many ancient palaces. Some idea of the long pedigree of which the bride can boast is obtained from the fact that she was conducted to the altar by her brother, Prince Henry, who is the twenty-fourth of his name to occupy the princely throne of Reuss. Her husband also comes of an ancient family. Though he has ruled his present principality only since 1887, and was the first of his family to occupy that position, he can claim on his father's side descent from the princes of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, and on his mother's side from the Bourbons through King Louis Philippe, who was his maternal grandfather. The marriage was the second he has made. His first wife, who died in 1899, was Marie Louise, Princess of Bourbon-Parme. The issue of that marriage was two sons and two daughters, the eldest of whom, Prince Boris, is heir to the throne of Bulgaria. After the ceremony, at which the guests wore their princely robes and decorations, making a most resplendent show, the couple retired to Gera, the capital of the territory of the younger branch of the bride's family. This city, the seat of government, has a population of 46,909. The population of the entire principality is only 144,584, while the population of the principality ruled by the elder branch of the family, in the person of Henry XXIV., is only 70,603. The area of this little principality is 120 square miles, or one-tenth the size of Rhode Island. It is amusing to think of the pride such people take in the long line of their ancestors, regarding themselves as being superior to others on that ground alone. The tendency, however, is not a new one. John the Baptist had to reprove it in his day.

Think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father; for I say unto you, that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham. (Matt. 3: 9.)

The Oldest Temple in the World

A cable dispatch to the New York Sun states that a temple has been partially uncovered in Bisya, in ancient Babylonia, which antedates all other buildings hitherto found. The walls of the tower were first uncovered and the summit cleared. The first inscription on the surface was on a brick stamped with the name Dungi, which goes back to 2750 B.C. A little lower appeared a crumpled piece of gold with the name Param Sim, who lived in 3720 B.C. Just below were large square bricks, peculiar to the reign of Sargon, 3800 B.C., who was probably the first of the Semitic kings of Babylonia. A large platform was discovered two and a half yards below the surface, which was constructed of peculiar convex bricks such as were used in building material 4500 B.C. This would apparently make the building nearly 6,500 years old, if not older; but it is not at all certain that the antiquarians may not err in their calculations. If they are right, it is remarkable that the oldest building in the world should have been a temple, but there is reason to fear that at a period antedating that of Abraham, it must have been an idol temple and not one for the worship of the true God.

The times of ignorance God overlooked, but now he commandeth men that they should all everywhere repent. (Acts 17: 30, R.V.)

A Hundred Dead Trains

The short-circuiting of a high potential feed cable, one evening last week, put a hundred moving trains on the four elevated railroads of New York out of business. The accident occurred at an hour when seven 5,000 kilowatt generators are whirling out the power to move the trains, loaded to the doors with home-seeking workers. By a system of automatic checks such a short circuit stops the generators—if it didn't there would be trouble—and it is also automatically recorded which cable has broken down. Four branch stations on the East Side and three on the West Side receive the high voltage alternating current which the main station generates, and although making no power themselves, step down this high voltage electricity into a current of lower intensity and a continuous instead of a throbbing flow which can be used best on the third rail. All these branch stations, of course, went out when the generators died and the system lay paralyzed. Every train stopped, and its lights went out. Passengers in trains that had stopped near a station, walked through the cars to the platform, but many sat still in the dark cars till the whole trouble was remedied, which was done in about twenty minutes. It was a suggestive spectacle, that of one hundred rushing trains, with their complete apparatus and running gear intact, brought to a standstill by lack of the invisible force that could in a moment set them all simultaneously living bridge. It was tested first by the woman, the other policeman standing well forward and holding out his hands. Then the husband passed the two children along and finally stepped over the bridge himself. The heroic policeman held firmly until his comrade told him all was well and helped him to drag his strained limbs to safety. He must have had extraordinary physical strength, as well as moral courage. Few would have run so great a risk for the rescue of strangers. As we admire such heroism and self-forgetfulness, let us not fail to remember that the whole human race has been delivered by such heroic qualities in their supreme degree.

Ye who sometime were far off are made nigh by the blood of Christ. (Eph. 2: 13.)

A Deferred Inheritance

One of the watchmen working for a firm of metal dealers in Long Island City has asked for a certificate of steadiness and good conduct. Pressed to explain his motive, he stated that he was not serving under his true name. He said he was a German baron, and produced documentary evidence in support of his claim. While serving in the German Naval Academy he had become involved in a quarrel with a man of influence and fought a duel with him. Fearing punishment, he came to America. He had lived successively in no less than eight of our large cities, generally serving on the police force. He never made any progress, for when he was rising in favor, he grew tired of the job and moved to another city and another occupation. He said he could not overcome his restlessness and what Germans call wanderlust. His family urged him to return, and assured him that he would not be punished for an offense committed more than twenty years before. He seldom received these letters until they had been remailed several times, and they produced no result. But he had learned now that his mother, who had always loved him and yearned for him, has left him all her property, on condition that he settle down somewhere, and prove that he has overcome his wanderlust by holding some regular employment for a few years. He wants the certificate from the metal dealers, so that the period he has been in their service may be counted into his term of probation. His mother knew his character, and was wise in stipulating that he give proof of his change before taking possession of the fortune. It is not so that God deals with his wandering children. They receive their inheritance at once, and he gives them the power to serve their probation afterward.

I give unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish. (John 10: 28.)

A Fatal Disguise

A singular story coming from Black Creek, Wis., is published by the New York Herald. It states that a school teacher of Black Creek recently attended a masquerade ball in an adjacent town. She chose to disguise herself in the shape usually used to depict Satan, and she accordingly prepared grease and paints after the theatrical methods to give her face and hands the tinge ascribed to the diabolic regions. The ball was a pronounced success and the school teacher's costume was the most striking in the room. But she had trusted to her own ideas about the grease and paint, instead of obtaining advice from some theatrical costumier. The result was that when she retired after the ball she was unable to remove the relics of the night's pleasure. She tried for some time, until, wearied out, she went to bed and to sleep in the disguise. The next day, all efforts proving unavailing, a physician was called in, who sent her to a hospital. There she died from blood-poisoning a few days afterwards. Perhaps any other make-up would have had the same result; but her choice of that character indicated a disposition to make a joke of a most serious and gruesome subject. It may be hoped that her desire to resemble that awful being was limited to his traditional appearance. It would be very sad if she had wished to resemble him in character.

Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do. (John 8: 44.)

in motion. There are many churches in similar condition with perfect organization, but needing the power that God alone can give by his Spirit.

I know thy works, that thou hast a name, that thou livest and art dead. (Rev. 3: 1.)

A Human Bridge

An imperiled family in a New York tenement house was rescued from a horrible death a few days ago by the ingenuity of two policemen. They detected a fire and turned in an alarm, but before the engines arrived they perceived that a young man, his wife and two children were in imminent danger. They were in a flat on the sixth floor of the house and the flames appeared to have filled the hall on which the flat opened. There was no fire-escape there, though there was one at a window on the same floor east of the roaring furnace. The policemen made their way to that room and one of them, lying flat and stretching out his hands, reached to a narrow ledge of masonry, just below the window of the room in which the imperiled family stood. His body formed a

A RICHLY ENDOWED ORPHANAGE

AFTER hiding in modest seclusion for nearly half a century, one of the finest orphanages in the world, founded by private funds, has been thrown into the limelight through the extension of the city of Philadelphia to its gates. As with many other charities that owe their origin to bequests made long ago, the property acquired for the orphanage has become in course of time immensely valuable.

Forty-eight years ago, Eliza Howard, widow of Edward Shippen Burd, died, leaving a bequest of about $700,000 to build and endow a permanent home for orphan girls, in connection with St. Stephen's Church, Philadelphia. Mrs. Burd was born in the Quaker City in 1793, and was of an old and prominent Philadelphia family. She married at the age of seventeen, and with wealth, position, and a happy home, the future looked particularly bright for the bride. But great benefactions do not often grow out of fulfilled human hopes. The orphanage had its beginning in the laceration of a woman's heart.

From her marriage until she was left in her splendid home, thirty-nine years later, Mrs. Burd's life was a succession of bereavements. Of eight children, only three lived beyond infancy, and these, a son and two daughters, died at the ages of fifteen, twenty-four and twenty-nine. Mr. Burd died in 1849. The widow devoted her life to charitable works, and seven years later laid the foundation for the Burd Orphanage in two houses at the rear of her residence. Here twelve little girls were received, fed, clothed, and taught. The cots occupied by these first recipients of the Burd bounty are still preserved.

From this small beginning, Mrs. Burd resolved to establish an institution for the education and training, first, of the orphans of the clergy of the church and the better class of children, for whom no suitable provision in common homes and asylums had been made. For this purpose, in 1859, she added a codicil to her will, bequeathing her estate to the rector, church wardens and vestrymen of St. Stephen's Church, to establish, maintain and support an institution "to be called, in honor of her beloved husband, the Burd Orphan Asylum of St. Stephen's Church." The will enjoins that "all the children received into the asylum shall be faithfully instructed as a part of their education in the principles of the precious Gospel of Christ, as they are taught and held in the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States." Mrs. Burd died in 1860, aged sixty-seven. Upon her death, trustees purchased the present site of the orphanage, fifty odd acres, and began the erection of the stately Gothic pile which, three years later, opened its doors in welcome. The land and buildings cost upwards of $175,000 and the available endowment of the home is a clear half million. The orphanage has never had to come before the public hat in hand. Its field, too, is in a sense restricted, since it aims to help, first, girls of educated parentage, especially the children of Episcopal ministers, and to bring them up to such occupations as might have been chosen for them by their parents, had the latter been spared. There are about eighty girls in the orphanage.

The spacious, sloping grounds are very beautiful. A winding drive skirts the great lawn, having on its left the sunny pasture where the Asylum cattle graze. On the rear lawn groups of girls may be seen at play in their neat blue-and-white striped dresses.

The style of architecture is early English Gothic, and the buildings are arranged in the form of a Greek cross. A handsome tower surmounts the chapel and main entrance. On passing through the entrance hall of the central building into the square rotunda, one sees on every hand the glitter of cut glass and crystal pendants. Surprise deepens into wonder on entering the reception room and confronting the white and gold magnificence of a set of Gobelin tapestry brought by Mrs. Burd from Paris, and once the property of the hapless queen Marie Antoinette. Here is a library of four thousand volumes, family portraits and busts, and a royal collection of china, cut glass, and bric-a-brac.

An interesting first floor apartment is the large sewing room, where the girls sit at their work. A relic of the founder's home is here in the shape of a dining table of solid mahogany, thirty-six feet long. In this room, besides the sewing machines, stand the telegraph and typewriting apparatus. The orphanage has sent out a large number of stenographers, teachers, needle-workers, bookkeepers, saleswomen and clerks.

A Beautiful Volume

MOTHERS IN A WORLD CONGRESS

AT the First International Conference on the Welfare of the Child, in the Metropolitan Methodist Church, Washington, March 10-17, the expansion of the National Congress of Mothers to a world-wide organization was formally signalized. The Conference was a consensus of expert opinion, achievement, suggestion and plans on behalf of the best interests of the child and the home.

That "internationalism" in work for home and child training could be accomplished right here in America, was the significant suggestion of the representatives from Greece, Hungary and Turkey. That devoted patriot and consecrated teacher, Miss Sevasti Callisperi, of Athens, Greece, a woman of high Christian culture, and inspector of schools for girls in Greece, at the close of a graphic review of conditions in her own land, made an earnest appeal for the 150,000 Greeks in America. "Be like mothers to them," she pleaded. She urged that the Congress should aid in providing instruction for the young Greek children in America.

Care for the 100,000 Macedonians and the 50,000 Albanians here was eloquently urged by Miss Ellen Stone, the former captive missionary.

To urge the Mothers' Congress to help the native women and children, whom he describes as cruelly ill-treated and held as slaves by the Portuguese traders of West Africa, was the object of General Francois Joubert Pienaar. He was obliged to leave his home in Angola, West Africa, because of his opposition to the conditions of slavery which he declares he found there. The need for help in Persia, where there is a great awakening to higher ideals of home and national life, was impressed by Mrs. Josephine Cowles, sister of President Roosevelt, and also by the Persian minister.

The introduction of the Juvenile Court in Hungary was the theme of Philip Rottenbiller, LL.D., a prominent philanthropist and lawyer of Budapest, sent by Emperor Franz Joseph as his country's representative to the Conference. Great Britain's contribution to the symposium was the work of the British Mothers' Union, a church organization, now numbering over 275,000.

The beginning of Mothers' Congress work in Mexico was announced by two delegates appointed by the Mexican Government, Senora Lopez (who stated that in the city of Mexico at the present time there is a large day nursery for 1,000 children under the watchful care of President Diaz), and Senorita Estefana Castaneda, supervisor of the twenty-six free public kindergartens of Mexico City. This lady was sent to Washington by the Mexican Republic to study the methods of the Mothers' Circles here.

Delegates appointed by the Governors of over thirty States—experts in child-training, charity workers, skilled educators and home-makers—came with practical plans for the consideration of the Congress. President Roosevelt, in his opening address at the White House, where he, with Mrs. Roosevelt, Mrs. Longworth, Miss Ethel Roosevelt, Miss Carow, Mrs. Cowles and other members of the Presidential family and household, heartily received the Congress, bespoke the mothers' co-operation for a complete training for their vocation in life, both for the boys who were to become artisans and mechanics, and for the girls who were to become mothers and home-makers; and for playgrounds for the children everywhere.

Plans for a National Mothers' and Children's Building, to serve for a national headquarters at Washington, and as a memorial to the late founder of the National Congress of Mothers, Mrs. Theodore Birney, were submitted.

Mrs. Frederic Schoff was elected President for another term of three years.

An amendment to the Federal Constitution was advocated giving the Government power to deal with polygamy. J. A. S.

How to Gain Christ's Commendation

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

JESUS had been in retirement at a little town in the east country, called Ephraim, and had come by way of Perea, across the Jordan by Jericho to Bethany. But for the brow of the Olivet, Jerusalem would have been in sight. What was the Passover to which Jesus was going? It was the chief annual feast among the Jews, typifying the sacrifice of Christ, the Lamb of God, and also commemorating the time just preceding the Exodus when the firstborn of the Hebrews were saved from death by the sprinkling of blood upon the door posts and lintels, causing the death angel to "pass over." This was the fourth Passover in the life of Christ. He had cast the traders out of the temple when he attended the first Passover; at the second, he had the controversy about the Sabbath with the Pharisees. He probably did not attend the third Passover. At this, the fourth Passover, he was to be crucified, according to prophecy.

The Anointing

"Where Lazarus was." What a peculiar measure it was to Christ to find Lazarus here, him whom he had raised from the dead! Those who have rescued others from death may know something about how Jesus felt. The medal which the rescuer receives is the smallest part of the reward, and not to be compared with the satisfaction which noble living brings.

"There they made a supper; and Martha served." We are told in Mark's Gospel, also in Matthew, that a supper was given in the house of Simon the leper, but whether the occasion was the same is a disputed question. The woman, the act and Christ's comment on the two cases all differ. Simon as a restored leper, else he could not have invited guests to his house. Why did Martha serve? In some way there was an intimate family relation that has not been explained. She may simply have been one to render a neighborly service, such as is not uncommon to-day.

"Lazarus was one of them that sat at the table with him." How would we feel to sit with one who had been coffined? A telegram was received one day by a son, which read, "Father funeral next Thursday." It was a shock indeed, and immediate preparations were begun for the son to start on journey to his father's funeral. But just before train time the father walked into the son's house, saying that he had come to make a visit. The second shock was almost as great as the first. There seemed to be something almost uncanny about the father's person. It was afterwards explained that the telegram should have read, "Father is wanted to conduct a funeral on Thursday" (for he was a pastor). Certainly Jesus did not feel that Lazarus was uncanny, but some of the supper may have felt so. The personality of Jesus was over all. Some one has said, "Jesus in the home at Bethany was like the ark of God in the home of Obed-edom, blessing it beyond measure." It must have been so as he sat in the house of Simon.

"Then Mary took a pound of ointment of spikenard, very costly, and anointed the feet of Jesus." Judas gives us the value of the spikenard, when he said in rowling criticism, "It might have been sold for three hundred pence." As a "penny" was equal to about sixteen cents, that would make the spikenard to be worth about forty-eight dollars. But if we estimate the value in day's wages received in those times, it must have had a value of nearer three or four hundred dollars. To-day women in Palestine receive twelve cents a day for carrying dirt in buckets on their heads out of the excavations at Gezer; at that rate, a woman would have to work one hundred days, or more than fifteen months, to earn such a gift. We are not told how Mary came into possession of so precious a thing. But it was none too good to bestow in loving gratitude on him who had been her teacher and the restorer of her brother.

Mary "anointed the feet of Jesus, and wiped them with her hair." It was not ointment as we know it to-day, but more like attar of roses in consistency, a liquid perfume, and said to have an odor like valerian and patchouli mixed together. Shall we say that Mary humbled herself by wiping the feet of Jesus with her hair? No, but rather that in honoring him, she honored herself. The house was filled with the odor. And so has the world been filled with it for almost nineteen centuries. And it is a sweetness that will never pass away, not even with this world; for surely since good works do follow the doers, it will also be odorous in heaven.

"Let her alone: against the day of my burying hath she done this." Jesus by these words set the seal of his approval upon what Mary had done. And it was a rebuke to Judas, who had found fault with Mary for the waste. In the judgment of Judas, it would have been better to have sold it and have put the proceeds in the Other Jews, not Sadducees, feared the influence of Jesus, whom they would not acknowledge as the Son of God. Notwithstanding this, "many of the Jews went away and believed on Jesus." A Jewish Christian minister one day made an appeal on behalf of the Jews to a large audience of Christian people in New York City. Among other things he said: "Preach the Gospel to the Jews. Think of them as a people who have never heard the Gospel: they have not heard it as you know it." It was quite a new thought to many people—a new view of the Jewish question.

Mary's Penitence

Central Truth. How can we act in the spirit of Mary?

It is not the deed we do,
Though the deed be never so fair,
But the love that the dear Lord looketh for Hidden with holy care
In the heart of the deed so fair.
The love is the priceless thing,
The treasure, our treasure must hold;
Or even the Lord will take the gift,
Or tell the worth of the gold,
By the love that cannot be told.

But love cannot be pure that has not

Take for example that other woman who also brought an alabaster box of ointment, and anointed the feet of Jesus and wiped them with her hair. (Luke 7: 36-50.) She is nameless, it is only said that she was "a sinner." She also had critics. Jesus answered them by saying: "Her sins, which are many, are forgiven; for she loved much; but to whom little is forgiven, the same loveth little."

But with love and penitence there must be mingled service, a service based upon self-sacrifice. We may not know how much that box of precious ointment cost Mary; but the more it cost, the sweeter was the opportunity to pour it out upon Jesus. We may get an illustration of self-sacrifice and the love that prompts it from the bird world.

Have you heard the tale of the pelican,
The Arab's grimelbar?
That lives in African solitudes,
Where birds that live lonely are?
Have you heard how she loves her tender young,
And strives and toils for their good?
She brings them water from mountains afar,
And fishes the sea for their food.
In famine she feeds them what love can devise—
The blood of her bosom, and feeding them dies.
You have heard these tales; shall I tell you one,
A nobler and better than all?
Have you heard of him whom the heavens adore
Before whom the hosts of them fall?
How he left the choirs and anthems above,
For earth in her wailings and woes,
To suffer the shame and pain of the cross,
And to die for the life of his foes?
O Prince of the noble! O Sufferer divine!
What sorrow, what sacrifice equal to thine?

We call it "instinct" in birds, but it is a God-given instinct to sacrifice for love's sake.

Unhappy Lives

Phillips Brooks said: "As one looks round upon the community to-day, how clear the problem of hundreds of unhappy lives appears! Do we not all know men for whom it is just as clear as daylight that that is what they need, the sacrifice of themselves for other people? Rich men who, with all their wealth, are weary and wretched; learned men whose learning only makes them querulous and jealous; believing men whose faith is always souring into bigotry and envy. Every man knows what these men need: just something which shall make them let themselves go out into the open ocean of a complete self-sacrifice. They are rubbing and fretting against the wooden wharves of their own interest, to which they are tied."

Said Garibaldi to his men: "I can offer you only hunger and danger; the earth for a bed, the sun for a fire; but let all who do not despair of the fortunes of Italy follow me," and with such an army the brave leader gave freedom to his country. A greater than Garibaldi has said: "He that findeth his life shall lose it, and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it." In the spirit of those words many disciples of Jesus have gone forth to do battle with sin.

Shortly before her death in 1845, Elizabeth Fry said to her daughter, "Since my heart was touched at seventeen years old, I believe I never have awakened from sleep, in sickness or in health, by day or by night, without my first waking thought being how I might best serve my Lord."

The alabaster box had to be broken before the ointment could be taken out. We are told in Psalms 51: 17 that the services which we render to God must be out of a broken heart, a heart from which has been removed the seal of self. "Less of self and more of Thee." "This is the constant prayer of every earnest Christian. Selfishness and Christ cannot control our hearts at once."

At last comes the epitaph upon the tombstone. Christ never lifted a hand to build a monument but once, and that was when he blessed the sentiment of love in Mary, who undertook to show her gratitude to him. He said: "Wherever my Gospel shall be preached throughout the wide world, in all time, this shall be told a memorial of her."

"This woman, since the time I came in, has not ceased to kiss my feet" bag that he carried, ostensibly to be given to the poor. That it was a misjudgment we know, for Christ rebuked Judas.

Jesus saw more in Mary's act than any one present there. An ineffaceable vision flashed upon all the feasters for an instant; they saw their Lord dead. Who among them would grudge the dead the last anointing? What man among them would think frankincense and myrrh too precious for the dead Master? But they grudged it to him living. It is there that the saying of Christ becomes so poignant. As Dr. Dawson says: "They grudged him the gift of Mary as we grudge the frankness and tenderness of affection to them we love when they are with us, giving them scant words and cold glances, and little sympathy or consideration, until a day comes when all our words are spoken to deaf ears and our tears fall fruitlessly upon a frozen forehead."

The Jews and the Message

"The chief priests consulted that they might put Lazarus to death." Why did they want to kill Lazarus? The Sadducees, to which sect many of the priests belonged, taught that there was no resurrection, and with the resurrected Lazarus in sight it was hard for them to hold their doctrine.

penitence in it. Indeed, we have no right to say that we love God until we are sorry for our sins and try to stop doing them. In the Christian life, the prayer of the penitent is as the oath of loyalty: "God be merciful to me a sinner." And penitence should be shown not only in words but in deeds. There must not be confusion of mind between penitence and penance. In "doing penance," one does some painful act under the direction of a priest to gain absolution of sin; but penitence is from the heart, and finds expression in some deed of love. Such was Mary's gift when she poured the precious ointment upon Jesus' feet.

And there is still another view-point to be taken of penitence. It is said of Aristotle, that great man of Greece, that he would lie down to sleep with a brass ball in either hand, which would drop into metal vessels at his side, when he would be entirely overcome with sleep, "dead asleep." The partial arousal which would come from the dropping of the balls was intended to moderate sleep, and so heighten intellectual capacity. And so it will be with us if we remember our sins: we shall be saved from self-righteousness, and kept alive to the blessing of salvation through what our Saviour has done for us.

Questions and Answers

L. L. H., Oakvale, W. Va. What is meant by the thorn in the flesh (II. Cor. 12:7), which Paul said was sent to him as a messenger from Satan?

It was evidently something that irritated and humiliated him in his ministerial work. He does not tell us what it was. Some think it was an affection of the eyes, basing their opinion on his remark (Gal. 4:15), that the people loved him so well that they would have given him their eyes had it been possible. Others think that it was stammering, basing their opinion on his remark (II. Cor. 10:10), that his enemies said his speech was contemptible. He was given to boasting, as is obvious in his epistles, and God, who knows the faults of his servants, allowed this to come upon him, whatever it was, to make him humble.

Oregon Reader. What has become of the transport Buford that carried THE CHRISTIAN HERALD supplies to China last year?

The Buford is actively engaged in the government service between America and the Philippine Islands. About two weeks ago she left Manila, bound home, with several hundred soldiers whose time of service in the archipelago had expired.

T. M. G., Liberty, Tenn. 1. Is there any possibility of the ark of the covenant being found? 2. Is it true that Jeremiah buried it? 3. May he not have buried it in the land that he bought? 4. Where did he die?

1. Yes, it will probably be found. Overlaid so thickly with gold as it was, it is unlikely that it has perished. 2. There is a statement in II. Maccabees 2:4, that by divine direction the ark was taken across the river to Mount Nebo, and that there Jeremiah found a hollow chamber in which it was placed. A question arose as to its being found again, but according to the historian, Jeremiah replied that the hiding place would remain unknown until God restored his people to his favor and to their land. This of course is tradition. 3. Jeremiah bought the land for an entirely different purpose and it is little likely to have afforded facilities for concealment. 4. The prophet was carried forcibly into Egypt after the destruction of Jerusalem. He arrived safely (see Jer. 43:8), and as we see later continued his denunciations of his people for deserting God. There is a tradition that he was stoned to death at Taphna, but nothing authoritative is known of him after his own statement that he was taken to Egypt against his will.

E. F. G., Fairfax, Ga. Why are rosin and turpentine called "naval stores"?

Only because they are used extensively in all shipyards. Supplies that are used in the building, repair, or operation of ships, are called "naval stores," when bought for that purpose. The other question sent should be submitted to a physician or a professor in some medical school.

W. M. B., Learned, Miss. In the miracle of feeding the five thousand when did the increase of provision take place?

Read the Gospel account of the incident (John 6:5-13). We know nothing more than is stated there. As a matter of opinion, we should think that the increase most probably took place as Jesus blessed the bread and fishes and distributed them to the disciples; but it may have been at an earlier or later stage of the miracle.

A. F., St. Thomas, N. D. 1. Is it right to have a box social in a church and auction the boxes, for the purpose of buying new hymnals? 2. We live in a neighborhood some distance from church and few people ever go to church. We used to work in church and Sunday School. Could you tell us something we might do? 3. Do you think it is possible for a man to be a successful evangelist, even if he does not have a college education, provided he is filled with the Spirit?

1. Such forms of raising money are detrimental to a church's spirituality. See Dr. Swallow's recent sermon in this paper on the subject. 2. Write to American Sunday School Union, New York City, for plans to begin Sunday School work in your neighborhood. 3. He may be successful as a soul-winner, even if he is not a highly educated man. Moody was not highly educated, and many of the foremost evangelistic workers have been men of indifferent culture, but deep spirituality and intense earnestness.

W. L. G., West Moshannon, Pa. Can a man be a good Christian who is a moderate drinker?

"Moderate drinking" is a delusion and a snare. Science, philosophy, morality and religion all tell us that indulgence in liquor is an inexcusable vice. Apart from all other considerations, is it not well to remember that the effect of our influence upon others may be such as to draw them into deadly peril? See Romans 14-21.

K. McA., Calabogie, Ont. What nationality were the soldiers who guarded the tomb of Christ? They were Roman soldiers, and as Rome sing, are to be preferred to any other and will do more to arouse interest in a congregation than the finest of set pieces.

J. B., Lincoln, Neb. What is the population of Buenos Ayres, Argentine Republic?

In 1905 it was 1,015,000.

H. W., Oxford, N. Y. I am discouraged by the statement of a Christian friend that he is perfect, while I am conscious of so many imperfections. Is it possible to attain to that state?

Do your friend's personal friends endorse his statement? Sometimes a man is not conscious of faults in himself that are conspicuous to his acquaintances. Christ bids us "Be perfect, even as your Father in heaven is perfect" (Matt. 5:48). Again we are enjoined to "go on unto perfection" (Heb. 6:1), and Peter mentions the stages (II. Peter 1:5-8). John Wesley, the chief advocate of the doctrine in modern times, admitted that the attain-occurred early in the ministry of Christ (John 2:13-16). That described by Matthew (21:12) was almost at the close. The dealers probably found the temple an excellent place for the traffic, and if, as is likely, they paid for the privilege of being there, they would return when Jesus was gone. The expulsion could not be permanent unless it was supported by the priests. Therefore, when Jesus returned to keep his last Passover, he found them at the old stand and expelled them a second time.

B. R., Memphis, Tenn. Are any statistics obtainable showing the decrease of drunkenness in the U. S. Army since the passage of the Anti-Canteen Law?

The Anti-Canteen bill passed in 1900 and was signed in 1901. Judge-Advocate Davis of Washington, D. C., who has charge of all general courts martial in the army, reports that in 1900 there were 1,645 courts martial for drunkenness. In 1901 there were 1,458; 1902, 960; 1903, 811; 1904, 616; 1905, 508; 1906, 504; 1907, 476. These figures, which are official, speak for themselves, and expose the absurdity of the claim that "the operation of the Anti-Canteen Law has increased drunkenness" and courts martial.

M. M., Albany, N. Y. It would seem that rats are prolific breeders. In this section we have them in abundance, probably because of our proximity to the river. Are we specially favored in this regard, or do other countries have the same trouble?

An English writer on the subject—an expert—lately stated that there are more rats than people in Great Britain, and that each consumed food estimated at half a cent per day. A pair of rats, it is said, may be multiplied to 800 in a year. They are notorious plague-carriers and should be stamped out wherever they appear in considerable numbers, especially in cities.

N. A. C., Rockville, Conn. Do you consider it right for one who professes to be a Christian, to have drunkards around his house?

Without knowing the circumstances or the motive, we could not express an opinion. It may be that the person in question is engaged in an effort for the reform of these unfortunates and is trying, by advice and example, to win them back to the path of sobriety and right living.

Trained Orphan Children of India, and the "Unbidden Guest"

MRS. E. E. SILLIMAN, of the American Baptist Mission, Narsaravupet, Guntur, India, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

The last payment for the India Famine Orphans has been received, and we wish to express our sincere thanks to you and the kind donors for the great help which you have rendered to these children for three years. We are indeed very grateful to you for your interest and help, and for your sympathy in this great work of making Christ known to this needy people of India. Some of the children who were on the list at the beginning are now teaching, others have entered other work, and a few of the girls have married and started Christian homes, which means much in a heathen land. This is a picture of our boarding department. The man in the dark coat is the head master, and the young man standing next to me is the assistant. The old woman at the rear on the right hand side is the girls' matron. There is a little "unbidden guest" in the front row, with uncombed hair. She is a little heathen child who wanted her picture taken, and although I asked her to go away, as she was not a pupil, she did not, so there she is, making quite a contrast to the neatly dressed Christian school children.

then had in her armies the representatives of many different nations, they might have belonged to almost any of the European peoples. The story you mention as to their nationality is mere speculation.

E. M. D. B., Washington, D. C., apropos of a recent article in this paper, writes:

Referring to your article entitled, "Sleeping in church," I wish to express the opinion that the one principal reason why people go to sleep during the sermon is too much choir and too little congregational singing. The choir performs four or five set pieces, very few of the words of which can be understood, and only two hymns, and when the sermon begins, which is nearly twelve o'clock, the average man, of which kind I am, is ready to go to sleep—in fact, I sometimes go to sleep while the choir is singing. What makes evangelists successful? Is it not due largely to the Gospel singing? I believe if there were Gospel songs used, congregations would be larger and more interested.

The neglect of congregational singing, and the tendency to run to oratorio or classical music, in which the congregation, for the most part, have little interest, is doubtless a cause of indifference in many churches. Good hymns, which all can ment was rare. It is obvious, however, that those who strive to gain it will approach it more surely than those who make no effort. Do not forget that the nearer a man is to perfection the less he is disposed to boast.

Inquirer, Covert, Kan. What is symbolized by the description (Rev. 13:16, 17) of the beast?

Students of prophecy are now practically agreed that it relates to the being called in other parts of Scripture, Antichrist, the Man of Sin, etc. It is believed that in the last days there will be a persecution, to which Christ referred (Matt. 24:21) as "the great tribulation," and that this last great enemy of Christ will be endowed with such power that he can cause all Christians to be boycotted, and as in the time when the Roman Catholic Church had power to excommunicate, the true Christian will be cut off from business dealings with others.

L. P. H., Falmouth, Mass. Did Christ clear the temple twice, or do both narratives refer to the same event?

SHOULD OUR WIVES BE WAGE-EARNERS?

By Margaret E. Sangster

THE wife's duty to her home does not include wage-earning unless her husband is infirm, crippled or ill. An able-bodied man should support his family. A married woman in ordinary circumstances has enough to do if she care for her house, keep her home pleasant, making it a safe harbor for her good man, and if there are children, looking after them as only a mother can. The common American mistake is to put too much effort into externals, so that life is more artificial than it should be, and simplicity forgotten. People live without a margin because they live with a thought of what their neighbors expect of them rather than with reference to their own needs and ideals. In a great many cases it is a misfortune for a woman to earn money, if married, as either the family expenses are doubled on account of the time and strength she uses, or her husband insensibly learns to depend upon her and lessens his own attempts to bring in a sufficient income. Home-making is woman's province, if she be wife and mother, and wage-earning is that of the husband and father.

Yet it must be conceded that thousands of women have a very great longing to earn spending money by some occupation that may be carried on at home. If, before marriage, a woman has been a skilled worker in any trade or profession, she looks back wistfully to the days when every week or every month she had the independence of her salary. There are women who carry on without seeming detriment to the comfort of their households small dressmaking or millinery businesses for their neighbors, without show or shop window or advertising of any kind. Others perhaps do embroidery, make preserves and pickles, food for invalids or delicious cake, selling these things at a Woman's Exchange. The basis of the many successful Woman's Exchanges carried on profitably, both in city and village life, is the anxiety and necessity that home-staying women feel to make a little money on which no one has a claim except themselves.

Where perfect confidence obtains between husband and wife, and both are agreed as to the style of the family living and the management of whatever income there is, a wife is sure to have some money at her command which she may use, save or bestow without reference to her husband. There are churlish husbands who might easily make their wives far happier than they are by greater liberality. A wife hates to beg for what she needs, and to have money doled to her as though she were a mendicant. In excess of such cases is a vast army of men who work hard and make little and have all they can possibly do to provide shelter, fuel and fire, clothing and shoes and pay doctor's bills. They would gladly give their wives money were it in their power, but it is always an elusive hope, and they never reach the place where the ground is firm beneath their feet. From the wives of these men comes the earnest cry, "Tell me how I can earn a little money for myself?"

Sometimes there is an aged mother or an invalid sister whom the wife is fain to help. Sometimes there is a charity dear to her heart, and again there is a wish to give lessons in music or drawing to a gifted child whose talent ought to be developed.

Notably the wish of women to earn money at home is founded on unselfish motives; not for their own gratification, but that they may add to the comfort and well-being of others are they willing to rise up early and sit up late and forego personal ease.

A few hints may be given to those who are eager to thus augment a scanty purse, yet can see no way of accomplishing their purpose. Do not try to secure work too far away from home. Strangers have no interest in you, they know nothing of your capabilities, they cannot give you practical counsel and they usually have people of their own near at hand whom they wish to assist. People have discovered gold in their own back-yards before now. It may be that a woman, if near a city market, can raise chickens, vegetables or flowers for sale. One little woman remote from markets discovered her opportunity in the artistic pressing of the beautiful wild flowers growing in her vicinity, classifying and labelling them, and gradually building up for herself a demand that paid her for her efforts. A woman early widowed and unable to leave home on account of little children sent specimens of her exquisite plain sewing to various great ladies, known to her only by name. Beginning with a few small orders, in the course of a few years she has so enlarged her business that she now employs between thirty and fifty women, and sends her beautiful work all over the country.

To succeed in wage-earning at home, a woman must have initiative, courage and immense perseverance. Only here and there one achieves a marked success, yet there are many who, by the exercise of skill in some quiet way, manage to get a fair return for their work, and add a little week by week to their private exchequer. If this can be done without injury to health or nervous exhaustion, it seems unfair to treat it as objectionable or beneath wifely dignity.

PRISCILLA AND JOHN ALDEN

Sweet was the maiden Priscilla,
And many there walked in her train;
But she smiled on each Puritan lover,
Was kind to each courteous swain.
"Why don't you speak for yourself, John?"
When one came who would plead for his friend,
The gentle Priscilla said coyly,
And thus did the wooing days end.

HINTS AS TO THE CARE OF CLOTHING

THE difference between two women, one of whom always looks well dressed while the other has an air of shabbiness and neglect, is frequently discernible in the manner in which each cares for her clothes. A stitch in time not only saves nine, but it often keeps a nice garment from losing its first appearance of newness, as a repair may be easily made when a hook or eye is loosened or a button gives way. If the necessary repair is postponed the trouble will soon go further, so that a neat job cannot be made even by an expert seamstress. Garments that one prizes should be carefully laid away when not in use, sleeves should be puffed out with tissue paper and folds of the same convenient material should guard the article against dust. On coming in from a walk or a visit, house dresses should be substituted for better ones, and those taken off should be carefully brushed before they are hung in a closet. Coat-hangers are very cheap, and are indispensable if one would like to preserve intact the shape of a jacket, wrap or waist. Women who are obliged to wear nice clothing every day for any reason may save the front of a dress from injury by the use of an apron, while sleeves may be protected by cuffs of linen, white oilcloth or straw. A woman who does her own work and much of her own sewing, and who is still always ready to receive a visitor, and sits at her table after preparing a meal, looking as fresh and fair as if her hands had been folded all the morning, covers her dainty gown with a large apron that envelops her from head to foot.

Frequent cleaning and pressing of a skirt that is worn in walking or traveling is essential to maintaining its modish aspect. A woman who throws her things about in confusion when done with them for the day, and who never can find them when wanted, need not expect to look well dressed.

A SCION OF KINGS

By BARBARA E. POPE

IN the vicinity of Luxor and Karnak, past a village of mud huts with its well and its white-domed tomb of a saint, stands a massive Egyptian villa of carved stone, surrounded by sycamores and acacias and approached through a long avenue of date palms. This villa with its acres of well-irrigated and highly cultivated land, together with flocks of sheep and herds of camels, buffaloes and other cattle, belonged to a native gentleman bearing the name of Mark Oreb. The name Mark indicated that the gentleman's parents were Copts and the Protestant Christian Church on the outskirts of the village proclaimed the fact that the old gentleman himself had become a convert to Presbyterianism.

The Orebs were descended from the line of Egyptian kings, and for centuries had fixed their residence near the site of ancient Thebes, handing down the villa from father to son, and handing down, also, to the eldest born the princely name of Aahmes. Mark had been a younger son, inheriting from a childless brother. There had been a wedding at the Oreb villa. The only daughter of the house had married in the village church, and there had been an elaborate marriage festival in the evening, relatives and friends having come from every section of the country and even from the Soudan.

The next day, when the bride and bridegroom had departed for their home, Mark and his wife stood in the great reception hall of their mansion, wishing godspeed to the guests who had lodged in their home. Down the broad avenue of date palms passed the merry throng, some on foot, walking side by side with the musicians, while others rode donkeys and camels, and not a few were conveyed in carriages to the steamboat landing and the railway station. Finally, a quaintly costumed couple with a long train of attendants, a man and woman, black almost as Nubians, but of distinguished appearance, mounted their kneeling camels for an overland trip to the Soudan, and Mark and his wife were left in the reception hall with only their son and his most intimate friend.

"When our people gather, as at this time, from the four corners of the earth, it does my heart good to look upon them; but a medley we make of it with our old and our new," said Mark Oreb, smiling.

"Let the young people have progress even in such matters as barbarities in dress," said Madam Oreb, amiably, as she shook out, with much satisfaction, the scanty folds of her girdled silk gown. The old lady and her husband clung to the comfortable dress of their fathers, but the two young friends, handsome young men of a yellowish hue, wore with the tall fez the ordinary morning clothes of the upper class European.

"What a nation we might now make of ourselves, if the land were only our own," said Joseph Neris, one of the young men.

"That is what I have been thinking," said Aahmes Oreb, passionately.

"Cease those vain desires, my son, and settle down as I and those of our line who were before us were constrained to do," chided Mark. "Here are goodly acres and, with the farm in the Delta, you have something of a heritage. Curb that chafing spirit and be content."

"Kamena has married, and, if Aahmes had only hearkened to us, Judith might now be here to fill the place of our daughter. Aahmes and Kamena came into life together, twins bestowed upon us by the good Father after long years of beseechings, and it seemed so fit that they should stand at the same time to receive the marriage blessing," said Aahmes' mother.

"Two years hence will suit Judith as well as last evening," replied Aahmes. "You complain that I wrong her by so long waiting, but she sheds no tears over her extended freedom. Kamena looked youthful as a bride of twenty-two, and Judith will look as well at the same age."

"But Kamena would have wedded six years ago, had not he to whom she was first betrothed died," said the mother.

The conversation was here interrupted by the entrance, from an inner chamber, of two young women of about the same age and of a fair height, the one stately and the other slender, two beauties of the Nile such as graced the courts of the Pharaohs and captivated and subdued visiting princes and philosophers.

Judith Veneran, Aahmes' betrothed, was of the statuesque type, a divinity cast in a classic Egyptian mould, perfect in form and perfect in feature. From the crown of her regal head to the sole of her arched foot, in the line of her nose and in the coral bow of her lips, in her large, long black eyes, and even in the shell-like structure of her ear, there was neither flaw nor blemish. Nature had so fashioned her, and seemed to set her forth for admiration. Her street costume was Parisian, simply made.

In Taisu Neris, Judith's companion, and the sister of Joseph, the charm lay chiefly in attractiveness of manner, and in a certain grace and loveliness. There was real beauty, however, in her almond-shaped eyes with their silky lashes, and her brownish complexion was faultless and her Coptic features refined. Her brow was broad and her face studious in repose; but she was capable of great animation, and her laugh, though not so frequent as that of Judith, was as gleeful.

"We have had an adventure," said Taisu, speaking in a voice of sweetest tone.

"Your sister has been guilty of a flirtation," said Judith, giving Joseph just one full glance of her large black eyes.

"You know me too well, brother, to believe this siren. 'Twas she who made dizzy the head of the poor captain," said Taisu.

"Captain Mustapha ben Ali," laughed Joseph. "We saw him ride by on his fine new Arabian."

"We were in the garden," said Taisu, "and he came riding around, declaring that he was hunting for a little jeweled scimitar which he claims to have lost last evening; but, from the looks, half timid and wholly languishing, which he cast on Judith, I am inclined to think that she was the jewel sought."

"You should have seen Taisu drop her veil at sight of him," said Judith.

"I am sorry that you expose yourself with such indifference, Judith," said Madam Oreb. "Even though you wear a hat when you go abroad, you could, like Taisu and my Kamena, have a short veil attached to shield your face from an impertinent gaze."

"The custom is obsolete," said Judith, haughtily. "Beside, my dear aunt, the captain's looks were not impertinent."

"Mustapha is an idiot," said Aahmes, shortly.

Judith made a grimace behind her future husband's back for the benefit of Joseph Neris, who felt called on to smile, but performed his task rather faintly.

It was not long before one of the carriages returned empty and the two young men assisted the young ladies into it. The four were driven to the railway station, from which Joseph and his sister took a train to Cairo, and Aahmes escorted Judith back to her home at Assiut.

Judith's father had in early life turned his attention to trade, and was now the richest merchant of Assiut, living there in a modern brick house of palatial proportions, and surrounding his daughter with every luxury that money could acquire. In her childhood, he had consented to her betrothal to the son of his aunt, and he had a proper appreciation of the honor of such a union, for even a nation bereft of power can esteem blood which has flowed in an uninterrupted channel from its own royalties.

A kiss, a hug, and Baby slips off his mother's lap into a bowl of clean, warm water.

There he finds two wonderful things—a Sponge and a cake of Ivory Soap.

Mother squeezes the sponge and water runs all over baby's arms, his legs and his little pink toes.

Then she takes the soap, does something with it—and baby is covered with a soft, creamy substance that takes all the dirt away and makes his skin as smooth as satin.

Baby squirms and splutters and splashes. But he enjoys it. So does his mother. So does everybody else.

There is nothing in all this world that is cleaner or sweeter than a clean baby; and there is no better way to keep a baby clean than by the regular use of Ivory Soap.

Ahmes Oreb could have presided with lightly over court and council chamber, or of victorious armies in the field. He was tall and strikingly handsome, and gave the impression of great force of character. In infancy he was an engaging child, and he grew into a manly little fellow bright and intelligent, chivalrous and daring. With his twin sister he played among the ruins of temples, and won applause from the little maiden by his feats in climbing.

Ahmes soon became expert in horsemanship, and he learned to manage the swiftest racing camel, keeping his seat with the ease of the old sheiks in the desert. As was the family rule, his father began teaching him before he could speak plainly the names of the line of kings, and when Ahmes had grown old enough to go to school, he could recite without blunder the list, beginning with Menes, and give some account of the reign of each. He could, too, his descent through the entire line showing how, by marriage of the son of a new dynasty with a daughter of the former reigning house, the sacred blood of old Menes was transmitted to the native dynasty, prior to the Persian invasion, leaving the ancient line without dynarchical representative only during the usurpation of the Shepherd Kings.

Such was Ahmes' claim, and such had been the claim of his ancestors. As he grew, he became more and more interested in the achievements of the sirs, and he would spend hours deciphering inscriptions on columns and monuments, and in studying the tombs on the other side of the river. His father had rolls of precious papyrus and from them he added much to his store of history.

In his youth thought proudly of what his country had been, and he considered her present condition. There was some quickening of life, some feeble flutterings of the Phoenix-like rise from the cold ashes of the funeral pyre; but how tame was the situation! Furthermore, for Egypt's own children still lived; then, why not Turk, the Arab, and the Englishman? The spirit of the greatest Pharaoh of old was not stronger or more ambitious than that which had been born in times. He saw, or fancied he saw, no possibilities, and he began dreaming of mighty deeds.

With the easy indulgence characteristic of all their dealings with the children of the old age Mark Oreb and his wife yielded to their son's desire to take a long course abroad, and Ahmes went to Vienna, where he distinguished himself, and then he traveled for a year, grasping every idea that could benefit to himself and his country. Returning home at the age of twenty-one, he wanted to master the art of war. A commission in the army was secured; but it was not easy for one of his temperament to serve as subordinate in strict military rule under those who were to alien lords over his own domain. A young officer resigned his commission, embittered, but not despondent.

Ahmes staid nearly a week at home, but Judith could scarcely have deterred herself that his lingering was like. He was with her at times, but interest centred in the townspeople and conditions, whom he visited and died diligently.

"I give you this as a talisman to insure a safe passage back to me," said Judith Veneran, as Ahmes sat beside her on a divan the morning appointed for leave-taking.

"Thank you." The young man was holding the trinket, a bangle from one of her bracelets, into his vest pocket, when she reached out to stop him.

"Don't put it where you will run the risk of losing it," she cried. "Attach it to your watch chain. Wait. Let me do it."

"Do you believe in such superstitions?" asked Ahmes.

Judith laughed. "In truth, I don't believe much in anything," she confessed.

"I don't like your speech," said

Aahmes, frowning. "It seems to me that you affect a vulgar lightness of both speech and manner."

"Now, don't scold," pleaded the beauty, laying her jeweled hand caressingly on his shoulder.

"Did I hear you singing last night after I had retired?" inquired the matter-of-fact lover, when a pause had ensued, during which no notice had been taken of the caressing hand.

"Possibly," answered the lady, coldly, withdrawing her hand.

"The song is familiar to me. Where could I have heard it?"

"I learned it of Taisu Neris. She found the words in some of that old rubbish that she delights to delve in and set them to music. I care nothing for the verse, but the air pleases me. It is lovely rendered by a male voice."

"A good baritone or bass could awaken with it the deepest emotion. It is a prayer for a renewal of life addressed by a dying warrior to the god Ptah. The music accords admirably with the sentiment of the verse, and swells out nobly in the last plea. It must have been at Joseph's house that I first heard it."

"They say that Taisu entertains lavishly in Cairo. Is it true?" asked Judith.

"I would hardly express it in that way. Her company seems to be much sought after. I visited Joseph regularly during my stay in Cairo, but I saw little of Taisu. I have never interested myself greatly in women. It is not that I am lacking in high regard for the sex, but my parents kindly chose a wife for me, and I have not found it necessary to seek other female society."

"You don't seek mine often," said Judith, tapping his cheek with her fan, as he arose to prepare for departure.

When the parting kiss had been given and she had been left alone, Judith summoned her maid to inquire if the young Turkish captain, seen at her cousin's wedding, was in reality one of the new officers assigned to the military post near Assiout.

"I knew his smiling face, and he asked after your good health, and gave me a handful of coins to say nothing to you about it," said the woman.

The Finishing Touch to the Attractiveness of Your Home is the Decoration of the Walls

You can make an old house as bright, cheerful and attractive as it was when new, by decorating your walls artistically with Alabastine.

When the house is new, and the wood-work fresh and clean, you can keep it absolutely sanitary by decorating with Alabastine.

The dainty Alabastine tints make the most pleasing background for pictures, furnishings and furniture, and enable you to have the entire house finished in one complete color scheme so that one room blends into the next. All of the rooms will be brighter, more cheerful, more artistic. The cost will be less, and your satisfaction greater. Any one can easily apply Alabastine by simply following directions on the package.

Alabastine The Sanitary Wall Coating

becomes a part of the wall itself. One tint can be applied over another as often as desired without the bother or expense necessary where old wall-paper or kalsomine has to be first washed or scraped from the walls. This cuts the cost of decorating in half. Alabastine decorations will last longer, for Alabastine neither fades, rubs off nor scales.

Many of the beautiful color effects that can be produced with Alabastine are shown in detail in the book "Dainty Wall Decorations," which contains complete color plans for any home. This book will be sent you post-paid for 10c in coin or U. S. stamps. It is worth far more to anyone intending to decorate. Tint cards mailed free on request.

Ask your dealer for Alabastine and insist upon having Alabastine

Alabastine is sold in carefully sealed and properly labeled packages at 50c for white and 55c for tints, by all Paint, Drug, Hardware and General Stores. Old-Time Health, Eating Grape-Nuts.

"I had been sick for ten years with dyspepsia and a lot of complications," wrote an Arkansas woman.

"An operation was advised, change of climate was suggested, but no one seemed to know just what was the matter. I was in bed three days in the week and got so thin I weighed only eighty-nine pounds. No food seemed to agree with me.

"I told my husband I was going to try some predigested food to see if I could keep from this feeling of continued hunger.

"Grape-Nuts and cream was the food I got and nothing has seemed to satisfy me like it. I never feel hungry, but have a natural appetite. Have had no nervous spells since I began this food, and have taken no medicine.

"I have gained so much strength that I now do all my housework and feel well and strong. My weight has increased eight pounds in eight weeks and I shall always eat Grape-Nuts, as it is far pleasanter than taking medicines." "There's a Reason." A Noted Theologian Dead

AFTER an illness of nearly a year's duration, involving much suffering, the Rev. Charles Cuthbert Hall, D.D., President of Union Theological Seminary, New York, and formerly pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Brooklyn, passed away at his home in Manhattan on March 25. He was fifty-six years of age. During a world tour, from 1903 to 1906, he contracted a tropic fever in Japan, from the effects of which he never fully recovered, and which ultimately led to fatal complications.

Dr. Hall was born in New York City in 1852, and was the son of Mr. William C. Hall, the head of a New York firm of importing druggists. He entered Williams College at seventeen, and was graduated in 1872. From youth his desire was to enter the ministry, but his voice becoming affected when he was about twenty, he temporarily abandoned the idea. In 1872, however, he entered

The Late Dr. C. Cuthbert Hall

Union Theological Seminary, and two years later was licensed to preach. He visited Great Britain, and took post-graduate studies at the Presbyterian College in London and in the Free Church College, Edinburgh. On his return he was ordained, and became pastor of the Union Presbyterian Church, of Newburg, N. Y.

In 1877 he was called to the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church in Brooklyn, where for twenty years his ministry was a notable one, and his spiritual influence marked and widespread in that city. He was the author of several able books, among them being Does God Send Trouble? Into His Marvelous Light, and The Gospel of the Divine Sacrifice.

His advanced views on certain theological questions, while absolutely sound, were so ably set forth that on one occasion a resolution was introduced in Presbytery which aimed at having him tried for heresy, but Presbytery promptly sustained him and killed the resolution.

After serving the First Presbyterian Church for nearly twenty years Dr. Hall was elected to the presidency of Union Theological Seminary in 1897. During his pastorate Dr. Hall paid much attention to music. With the assistance of Dr. Lasar, Dr. Hall compiled The Evangelical Hymnal, which introduced a higher standard of devotional music, and was adopted largely through the country.

Twice he was chosen as the Barrows

Lecturer in India, and he visited that country and won an enviable reputation for his fine literary abilities. During his second visit to the East he contracted the disease from which he died. He was long a trustee of Union Seminary before election to the presidency, and in 1894 he declined a call to the chair of sacred rhetoric and pastoral theology in Andover Seminary.

Greater New York's New Bridge

WITH hundreds of workmen swarming about the iron girders, and driving a bolt here and fastening a rivet there, another bridge, called "The Blackwell's Island Bridge," is nearing completion and will make another connection between old New York, or the Borough of Manhattan, as it is now called, and Long Island. To one standing below at the water's edge, or looking up from the deck of a steamer bound up the sound to Fall River or Providence, the bridge seems practically complete, and, in fact, it is possible now for foot passengers to make a passage on a temporary wooden walk along the steel beams.

There are now three bridges between Manhattan and Long Island, the old Brooklyn Bridge and the Williamsburg Bridge to the Borough of Brooklyn, and this latest structure which spans, with its great network of iron and steel, the waters of the East River between Manhattan and the Borough of Queens.

The "Blackwell's Island Bridge," of which an illustration especially drawn for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD appears on the cover of this issue, is built on a different plan from those previously thrown across the swiftly rushing waters of the East River. The other bridges are suspension bridges with great towers of stone or steel from which hang the long cables of wire that support the roadbeds. Here the island between the shores allowed the construction of piers so that the distance to be spanned without support was much less. The bridge is built on the cantilever system and resembles the celebrated cantilever bridge across the River Forth in Scotland.

The final "linking up" of the last open space was made an interesting ceremony. A workman employed by the construction company hung by the left elbow, his feet dangling in the air one hundred and thirty-five feet above the swift current of Queen's Channel. Holding himself as steadily as possible, he drove in with swift strokes of his right arm the hot bolts that linked up the eastern cantilever arm. The bottom cord that made the connection was a little less than two feet long, and it settled into place without a deviation of the sixteenth of an inch.

A little wooden bridge was placed over the steel bars and a delegation of city officials and well-known engineers walked across, while far below on the river, the captains of passing tugs and steamers pulled their whistle cords and sent up to the watchers above a noisy salute of sharp toots mingled with the long drawn wail of siren whistles.

The work on the stone piers began in 1901, and the iron work was commenced in 1904. The length of the bridge proper is 3,724 feet, and with approaches from either end it is 7,424 feet. The west span from Blackwell's Island to Manhattan is 1,182 feet long, and the east span from the island to the Borough of Queens is 984 feet. In the middle the bridge is 135 feet above the surface of the channel. When it is completed it will be double-decked. On the upper deck will be two promenades for foot passengers and four tracks for elevated trains. On the lower deck will be one inside trolley track, two outside trolley tracks and a roadway for horses and carriages. Over fifty thousand tons of steel have been used in its construction.

Although it has up to the present time been called the "Blackwell's Island" Bridge, there is a strong probability that in the near future its name will be changed to the "Queensborough Bridge."

Life in Possession* Christ's Loving Message*

HOPE of an immortality beyond the grave is not the only blessing that the truth of the resurrection brings to the Christian. That hope had been indulged before he rose. David had cherished it, the prophets had clearer glimpses of it, and even in Christ's own time it was a doctrine firmly held by the Pharisees. Paul was able to throw a whole assembly into turmoil by simply stating that his enemies were persecuting him because of his holding that faith (Acts 23: 6). But it was only a hope until Christ proved it by himself rising and appearing to men as sceptical as Thomas. Then the hope became certainty. Still there was more than the assurance of immortality in the inferences that were to be drawn from Christ's resurrection. Scarcely an instance occurs of men living to extreme age that we do not find them wearying for rest. Life becomes a burden when the years are counted above four score. To have it merely continued indefinitely would be a curse if nothing more.

The revelation of immortality has in it much more than this. The resurrection life has a new quality in it which affects the present life. He who has this hope in him lives under a new influence, even now. Christ spoke continually of the life that he gave; the life that would never end; the life that would pass through death unscathed; that would survive the destruction of the body and would sustain him who received it through suffering and sorrow here while on this side the grave. Not merely a rising again, but a life which we might have here, on which death has no power. It was this that Paul referred to when he wrote of his desire: "To know the power of his resurrection," the power of the life which flowed from the risen Christ into the souls of men.

It is this new resurrection life that we celebrate every Lord's Day. That day is the perpetual weekly memorial of the change from dead ceremonies into the glorious possession of eternal life. The resurrection becomes thus the culmination of Christ's work for us. He gives us now, imparts to us as we put faith in him, the same life that carried him triumphantly through the grave. Not the mere power of continued living, but the divine life that dwelling in him abundantly he gives freely to all who love him and live in him.

*Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society for April 19. "Sunday, our weekly Easter," John 20: 1-10, 19-23; Rev. 1:10.

WHAT glad news that message of Christ would be to his disciples! When they forsook him and fled on the night of his arrest, we may be sure they contrived in some way to keep themselves acquainted with subsequent events. From John and the women who stood around the cross, they would hear of the hours of suffering, the patient endurance and the final cry, "It is finished." That must have seemed to them the end of the whole movement, which had engrossed them for more than three years. He who had led them and taught them, and from whom they had expected so much, was dead, and their hopes had perished with him. The question must have arisen in their minds, too, whether they had not been mistaken all along. In the perturbation of that time, they would not be able to think clearly and would be liable to think that Jesus could not have been the divinely commissioned Being they had supposed him, otherwise God would have saved him from so ignominious a death. That his death could be a part of the divine plan would not be likely to enter into their conceptions. It would seem to them, as was natural, the close of his work and their part in it. Yet it must have bewildered them, for as one of them said (Luke 24: 21) "We trusted that it had been he who should have redeemed Israel."

To men in such consternation, in such perplexity and despair, what news so unexpected could come like that borne by the men obeying Jesus' own command, "Go, tell my brethren." Those beloved lips they had deemed silenced forever were still speaking and that, too, not in reproach for their desertion of him in his trouble, but in loving greeting. They were still his "brethren." Had the events of the past days been a ghastly dream? Had he survived the scourging and crucifixion? It could not be true. They had yet to learn that Jesus had not escaped death by his miraculous powers, but that a still more wonderful thing had occurred: he had passed through death, had endured its dread sting and had overcome it and risen victorious over it. No wonder that such a marvel became the subject of their preaching ever afterwards.

*Topic of the Epworth League for April 19. "Go tell my brethren," Matt. 28: 1-10; Isa. 40: 9-11.

FARM AND GARDEN

Sterling Seeds, printed above an attractive basket of vegetables, is the name given to the 24-page catalogue of Northrup, King & Co., seedsmen of Minneapolis. It is more than a catalogue of stock and prices; it is a pamphlet all should have who are interested in vegetables and flowers of any kind, for there are not only many attractive illustrations, but many hints from these experienced growers on ways of securing the best results. Starting with the useful beans and beets, there are many pages devoted to the vegetables that have made market gardening one of the most flourishing lines of business near all large towns and cities, and which is bringing in thousands of dollars annually to those who select the best plants and seeds. The model cauliflower and golden self-blanching celery are among their vegetable specialties that are rapidly becoming known throughout the country. The flowers represented include everything in bloom that can be grown indoors and out. The roses, especially the climbers, are very attractive. The Lady Gay well bears out its festive title as a cheerful addition to the walls of the house. The catalogue of 131 pages may be obtained by addressing Northrup, King & Co., Seedsmen, Minneapolis, Minn.

Under the striking title of Hardy Blizzards Belt Nursery Stock, the Gardner Nursery Company of Osage, Ia., are sending out a descriptive catalogue that cannot fail to be of great interest to all farmers and lovers of fruit culture who live in any of our States where it is not summer the year round. The Gardner Company's stock is grown under the climatic conditions that insure its survival after transplanting. A great many of our farmers, especially in the New England and Northwestern States, have bought stock from nurseries too far south, and the trees in consequence have perished with the first blasts of winter. Of course anything that can stand the northern blasts will flourish to the south of the "blizzard belt." Besides fruit trees and ornamental shrubs of all kinds, the Gardeners make a specialty of all kinds of berry bushes and vines. Berries grown from Gardner stock are attractively illustrated. The catalogue contains 161 pages and many illustrations. Address the Gardner Nursery Company.

Northern Grown Seeds is the name of the catalogue of L. L. May & Co., the well-known seedmen of St. Paul, Minn. This company has one of the most northern nurseries in the United States, and all its seeds, shrubs, and plants are adapted to the needs of growers who live in a climate of late springs and cold and early falls. There are doubtless many farmers who would be surprised at the varieties of corn that are developed by these seedmen. Four varieties of popcorn alone are produced. Realizing that a proper grazing grass is in demand by all milkmen and farmers who raise cattle for market, much time and research has been employed to attain the best results. Among those on the list for 1908 is the brouse grass, the frost-proof grass for the Northwest. The man with the home garden will notice with interest the pictured pages describing the vegetables and small fruits. For the woman of the house the flowering plants and the roses for which May is famous will have the most interest. The catalogue, of 98 pages, fully illustrated, is published by the L. L. May Co., Minneapolis, Minn.

Carrie H. Lippincott, the pioneer seed-woman of America, is sending out this season one of the most attractive catalogues of fruits and flowers that she has yet published. The cover, with its flowers in nature's own colors, from which peeps the face of a merry little gardener, gives an inkling of what is to follow. Several pages are devoted to the asters, which are of a size and perfection to surprise those who are only familiar with the aster grown in the average flower garden. Then follow forget-me-nots and the agrotum, which blooms luxuriantly all summer, and makes a pleasing note of color for three months. As one turns the pages it is hard to discover if there is anything lacking that will give pleasure to the lover of flowers. The variety of pansies and nasturtiums is almost bewildering. Grass and vegetable seeds are also grown by Miss Lippincott, all of the same high quality that characterize flower seeds. The catalogue, fifty-one pages of description and illustrations, may be secured by addressing Miss Carrie H. Lippincott, 602 606 Tenth St. South, Minneapolis, Minn.

An inquiry by mail for "the truth about it," addressed to the Industrial Savings and Loan Co., see page 295, will bring you valuable and trustworthy information about the safe investment of your savings.

A Grateful Missionary

Dear Dr. Klopsch: Yesterday's mail brought me the kind letters from the friends interested in my work, and also the check for $43. I am very grateful for your kindness in forwarding the above, and to the dear friends for responding to my appeal so promptly. I am so glad that I shall be able to start a Tamil Bible reader at once; and also that the problem of retaining my Chinese sister is solved for one year at least; and I thank God for his help. I will write to these friends, giving them the names of their respective representatives. I am very thankful for these loving gifts.

Where Paul Once Preached

THIS old Jewish synagogue, built in the first century before Christ, still stands in ancient Iconium, in Asia Minor. About the tenth century A.D. it became a Greek church, and the Greeks added the square wooden tower which surmounts it. At present the building is too old to be used, except as a clock tower. It can be seen from all parts of the city.

The chief interest in the old synagogue is that, according to local tradition, in the early days of the Christian Church Paul and Barnabas preached in it. They had been driven out of Antioch and reached Iconium footsore and weary. We read in Acts 14:1 that they both went into the synagogue and preached, and that many believed their teaching. At last, however, they were forced to leave Iconium. In his Epistle to Timothy (II. Tim. 3:11) Paul refers to his persecutions there.

Travelers in Asia Minor should not fail to visit this venerable building.

Two Drunkards Redeemed

TWENTY-TWO years ago, in the town of Motherwell, Scotland, two boys, Alec and Archibald, were in the same class at school. After leaving school, their ways separated, each choosing a different occupation. Both had ambitions to make a mark in the business world. Alec became a grocer's assistant, and soon started in business for himself, and for several years was prosperous. One day one of his customers loaned him a book to read. It was The Life of Jerry McAuley. Alec read it with great interest. He had given his heart to God in his youth, had been an active Christian worker, and for several years had preached the Gospel, so he was thoroughly interested, in sympathy with the work that was being told about in this book. However, he forgot about it in time, little dreaming what would cause him to think of it again years after. During a serious illness he was induced to try wine as a tonic. The craving for stimulants grew on him until it finally resulted in his losing his business and everything. He had married a Christian girl, and God had blessed them with two children, but drink had such a hold on him that he sacrificed everything. He came to New York to get away from the old life; but it was the same story repeated, until one day he remembered the book he had read in Scotland fifteen years before, and he made his way down to the Old McAuley Mission. There he heard the testimonies of the men who had been saved from such a life as he was leading, and hope sprang up in his heart. At the invitation he went forward to the mercy seat. His prayer was heard, and his whole life was transformed.

In the early part of January a letter came from a business man telling Superintendent Wyburn about a young man in his employ who had given way to drink. This young man came to the Mission. He became convicted of sin, and asking God's help, he started to lead a Christian life. One night, after hearing Alec testify, the new-comer spoke to him, and learned that he was his old school-companion.

In One's Own Home

A Study of a Married Man's Rights and Obligations in Relation to the Family

FIRST. Responsibility implies authority. If he is responsible for family support, there must be the legal and moral right to regulate the amount.

Second. There is at least a right equal to that of his wife as to the location of a home and style of living.

Third. His views and wishes as to family habits, guests and entertainments are entitled to respect and should have marked influence.

Fourth. His principles and convictions of right and duty should not be offensively opposed, condemned or disregarded.

Fifth. His personal comfort and physical condition should be considered.

Sixth. It is his right and duty to be governed by his own judgment and conscience as regards benevolence without interference from his family, except in the way of suggestion or conference, which is the mutual right of all the members when opinions differ.

Seventh. It is his right and duty to consider his children's permanent welfare in accordance with his judgment in regulating any pecuniary allowances he may make.

Eighth. It is natural and reasonable that man and wife have not the right to be absent from each other without consent. In this, as in other respects, it is the duty of both to consider the other's wishes, comfort and welfare.

Ninth. There should be such mutual respect, confidence and union as to prevent concealments, secrets and locked doors.

Tenth. There should not be a life or practice in the household that practically condemns the principles and would injure the reputation of its head, or refusal to concur and reasonably co-operate in his plans and efforts.

Eleventh. Within the limits of common sense and reason the right of every adult member of the family should be recognized to do God's work or fulfil all righteousness, as the Bible expresses it, without interference or hindrance, but the right of suggestion should be recognized.

THEY GROW

Good Humor and Cheerfulness from Right Food.

Cheerfulness is like sunlight. It dispels the clouds from the mind as sunlight chases away the shadows of night.

The good humored man can pick up and carry off a load that the man with a frown wouldn't attempt to lift.

Anything that interferes with good health is apt to keep cheerfulness and good humor in the background. A Washington lady found that letting coffee alone made things bright for her. She writes:

"Four years ago I was practically given up by my doctor and was not expected to live long. My nervous system was in a bad condition.

"But I was young and did not want to die so I began to look about for the cause of my chronic trouble. I used to have nervous spells which would exhaust me and after each spell it would take me days before I could sit up in a chair.

"I became convinced my trouble was caused by coffee. I decided to stop it and bought some Postum.

"The first cup, which I made according to directions, had a soothing effect on my nerves and I liked the taste. For a time I nearly lived on Postum and ate little food besides, I am to-day a healthy woman.

"My family and relatives wonder if I am the same person I was four years ago, when I could do no work on account of nervousness. Now I am doing my own housework, take care of two babies—one twenty, the other two months old. I am so busy that I hardly get time to write a letter, yet I do it all with the cheerfulness and good humor that comes from enjoying good health.

"I tell my friends it is to Postum I owe my life to-day."

Death Vanquished

By Mrs. M. BAXTER

DEATH received its death-blow when Jesus Christ arose from the dead. He was crucified that we also might be crucified with him, he rose again that we also might "walk in newness of life." If we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection" (Rom. 6: 5).

There can be no resurrection where there has been no death. "That which thou sowest is not quickened except it be" (I. Cor. 15: 36). Oh, how solemn this truth is that the resurrection life of Christ in us can be quickened only as we die to our own life! If we persist in clinging to the flesh, we must die. But, on the other hand, "if ye through the Spirit mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live" (Rom. 8: 13).

Just as death must precede resurrection, so surely resurrection follows death. "That which thou sowest, thou sowest not at body which shall be, but bare grain, but God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him" (I. Cor. 15: 37, 38). One Christ himself was sown on this earth's soil as "a root out of a dry ground" (Isa. 53: 2), having "no form or comeliness." There was restriction, objection and a dying to his own will, all through his life. Born in a stable, subject to his parents, following a humble vocation, tempted of the devil in the wilderness; and when he went about preaching, preaching rather to the country folk of Galilee than to the highly educated in Jerusalem; all through his life, he was completely subject to his father; he was the obedient Son moment by moment. "The Son can do nothing of himself." "As I hear I judge" (John 4: 3, 30; 8: 26, 28). The words that I speak I speak not of myself (John 4: 10). This is the death side.

"They were astonished at his doctrine, for he taught them as one that had authority, and not as the scribes" (Mark 6: 22). "And all bare him witness, and wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth" (Luke 4: 22). "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life" (John 6: 63). His Word quelled the storm, cast out the demons, healed the sick, brought Lazarus from his grave, etc.—no wonder the disciples said of it, "What word is this! for with authority and power he commandeth the unclean spirits, and they come out" (Luke 4: 36). This is the resurrection side; yet only the first dawn of it; to be consummated when, as the Word of God, followed by the armies of heaven, he will smite the nations by the sharp sword which goeth out of his mouth (Rev. 19: 13-15).

After Jesus had given up the ghost, commending his Spirit to his Father, and the centurion had borne witness to him, the multitude dispersed, smiting their breasts, under the impressions of the hour, but understanding nothing of the vondrous transaction which had just taken place. There were interested spectators also, the women that followed him from Galilee, but they "stood afar off," with three exceptions, Mary, the mother of Jesus; Mary, the wife of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalene (John 19: 25). These had gone deeper with Jesus than the other disciples, and the world and they had nothing in common. But there was one man, Joseph of Arimathea, whose purpose in life was to look for the kingdom of God. He sat silent in the council which condemned Jesus, and even now his faith was not shaken; he came boldly and asked for the body of Jesus. His request was granted; he took down the lifeless body of our Lord from the cross, wrapped it in linen, and laid it in a sepulchre "that was hewn in stone, wherein never man before was laid."

Alone in his death, Jesus must be alone in his burial too. The women who had followed him from Galilee truly "followed after, and beheld the sepulchre, and how the body was laid," but it was only to fall back upon their earthly conceptions and their earthly resources. They returned to busy themselves in preparing spices and ointments to keep the body of the Son of God from corruption! They did their best, but how little they had understood their Lord!

How often have many of the lady readers remarked that they would give anything to get rid of the drudgery of using the dirty coal and wood stoves—also the smoky oil wick stoves and their gasoline stoves which are so dangerous and liable to cause explosions or fire at any time.

Well, that day has arrived and a fine substitute has been discovered and every family can now have gas fuel for cooking, baking and heating and not have their kitchens a hot, fiery furnace in summer, and be carrying coal and ashes—ruining their looks and health.

Thousands a Week

Upon calling at the factory we found that this invention has caused a remarkable excitement all over the U.S.—that the factory is already rushed with thousands of orders and is evidently the Company's representatives and agents are making big profits as they offer splendid inducements.

As will be noticed from the engraving, this OIL-GAS GENERATOR is entirely different from any other stove—although its construction is very simple—may be easily and safely operated and is built on the latest scientific principles, having no valves, which is a marked improvement, as all valves are liable to leak, carbonize, clog up or overflow.

By simply moving a knob, the oil is automatically fed to a small, steel burner bowl or retort where it is instantly changed into gas, which is drawn upwards between two red hot perforated steel chimneys, thoroughly mixed with air and consumed, giving a bright, blue flame—hottest gas fire, similar in color and heating power to natural gas.

This invention has been fully protected in the United States Patent Office and is known as the HARRISON VALVELESS, WICKLESS, AUTOMATIC OIL-GAS GENERATOR—the only one yet discovered that consumes the carbon and by-products of the oil.

The extremely small amount of Kerosene Oil that is needed to produce so large a volume of gas makes it one of the most economical fuels on earth and the reason for the great success of this Generator is based on the well-known fact of the enormous expansiveness of oil-gas when mixed with oxygen or common air.

Oil-gas is proving so cheap that 15c. to 30c. a week should furnish fuel-gas for cooking for a small family.

Kerosene Oil from which oil-gas is made may be purchased in every grocery—is cheap and a gallon of it will furnish a hot, blue flame gas fire in the burner for about 18 hours, and as a stove is only used 3 or 4 hours a day in most families, for cooking, the expense of operating would be but little.

In addition to its cheapness is added the comfort, cleanliness—absence of soot, coal, dirt, ashes, etc.

What pleasure to just turn on the oil—light the gas—a hot fire ready to cook. When through, turn it off. Just think; a little Kerosene Oil—one match—light—a beautiful blue gas flame—hottest fire—always ready—quick meals—a gas stove in your home.

It generates the gas only as needed—is not complicated, but simple—easily operated and another feature is its PERFECT SAFETY.

Not Dangerous Like Gasoline

And liable to explode and cause fire at any moment. This stove is so safe that you could drop a match in the oil tank and it would go out.

The Oil-Gas Stove does any kind of cooking that a coal or gas range will do—invaluable for the kitchen, laundry—summer cottage—washing—ironing—camping, etc. Splendid for canning fruit—with a portable oven placed over the burner splendid baking can be done.

Another Important Feature

Is the invention of a small Radiator Attachment which if placed over the burner makes a desirable heating stove during the fall and winter so that the old cook stove may be done away with entirely.

While at the factory in Cincinnati the writer was shown thousands of letters from customers who were using this wonderful oil-gas stove, showing that it is not an experiment but a positive success and giving splendid satisfaction, and as a few extracts may be interesting to our readers, we produce them:

L. S. Norris, of Vt., writes: "The Harrison Oil-Gas Generators are wonderful savers of fuel—at least 50% to 75% over wood and coal."

Mr. H. Howe, of N. Y., writes: "I find the Harrison is the first and only perfect oil-gas stove I have ever seen—so simple anyone can safely use it. It is what I have wanted for years. Certainly a blessing to human kind."

Mr. E. D. Arnold, of Nebr., writes: "That he saved $4.25 a month for fuel by using the Harrison Oil-Gas Stove. That his gas range cost him $5.50 per month and the Harrison only $1.25 per month."

J. A. Shafer, of Pa., writes: "The Harrison Oil-Gas Stove makes an intense heat from a small quantity of oil—entirely free from smoke or smell—great improvement over any other oil stove. Has a perfect arrangement for combustion—can scarcely be distinguished from a natural gas fire."

Mr. H. B. Thompson, of Ohio, writes: "I congratulate you on such a grand invention to aid the poor in this time of high fuel. The mechanism is so simple—easily operated—no danger. The color of the gas flame is beautiful dark blue, and so hot seems almost double as powerful as gasoline."

Mrs. J. L. Hamilton writes: "Am delighted—Oil-Gas Stoves so much nicer and cheaper than others—no wood, coal, ashes, smoke, no pipe, no wick, cannot explode."

Hon. Ira Eble, J. P., of Wis., writes: "Well pleased with the Harrison—far ahead of gasoline. No smoke or dirt—no trouble. Is perfectly safe—no danger of explosion like gasoline."

Chas. N. Bendeke of N.Y. writes: "It is a pleasure to be the owner of your wonderful Oil-Gas Stove—no coal yard, plumbing—ashes or dust. One match lights the stove and in 10 minutes breakfast is ready. No danger from an explosion—no smoke—no dirt—simply turn it off and expense ceases. For cheapness it has no equal."

Agents Are Doing Fine---Making Big Money.

WONDERFUL QUICK SELLER

Geo. Robertson, of Maine, writes: "Am delighted with Oil-Gas, so are my friends—took 12 orders in 3 days."

A. B. Slimp, of Texas, writes: "I want the agency—in a day and a half took over a dozen orders."

Edward Wilson, of Mo., writes: "The Harrison very satisfactory—Sold 5 stoves first day I had mine."

J. H. Halman, of Tenn., writes: "Already have 70 orders."

This is certainly a good chance for the readers to make money this summer.

Hundreds of other prominent people highly endorse and recommend oil-gas fuel and there certainly seems to be no doubt that it is a wonderful improvement over other stoves.

The writer personally saw these Oil-Gas stoves in operation; in fact, uses one in his own home—is delighted with its working, and after a thorough investigation can say to the readers that this Harrison Oil-Gas Stove made by the Cincinnati firm is the only perfect burner of its kind.

It is made in three sizes—1, 2 or 3 generators to a stove. They are made of steel throughout—thoroughly tested before shipping—sent out complete—ready for use as soon as received—nicely finished with nickel trimmings, and as there seems to be nothing about it to wear out, they should last for years. They seem to satisfy and delight every user, and the makers fully guarantee them.

HOW TO GET ONE

All the lady readers who want to enjoy the pleasures of a gas stove—the cheapest, cleanest and safest fuel—save 1/3 to 1/2 on fuel bills and do their cooking, baking, ironing and canning fruit at small expense should have one of these remarkable stoves.

Space prevents a more detailed description, but these oil-gas stoves will bear out the most exacting demand for durability and satisfactory properties.

If you will write to the only makers, The World Mfg. Co., 6797 World Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio, and ask for their illustrated pamphlet describing this invention, and also letters from hundreds of delighted users, you will receive much valuable information.

The price of these stoves is remarkably low—only $3.25 up. And it is indeed difficult to imagine where that amount of money could be invested in anything else that would bring such saving in fuel bills, so much good health and satisfaction to our wives.

DON'T FAIL TO WRITE TO-DAY

For full information regarding this splendid invention.

The World Mfg. Co. is composed of prominent business men of Cincinnati, are perfectly responsible and reliable, capital $100,000.00, and will do just as they agree. The stoves are just as represented and fully warranted.

Don't fail to write for Catalogue.

$40.00 Weekly and Expenses

The firm offers splendid inducements to agents, and an energetic man or woman having spare time can get a good position, paying big wages, by writing them at once and mentioning this paper.

A wonderful wave of excitement has swept over the country, for where shown these Oil-Gas Stoves have caused great excitement. Oil-Gas fuel is so economical and delightful that the sales of these Stoves last month were enormous, and the factory is rushed with thousands of orders.

Many of the readers have spare time or are out of employment, and others are not making a great deal of money, and we advise them to write to the firm and secure an agency for this invention. Exhibit this stove before 8 or 10 people and you excite their curiosity, and should be able to sell 5 or 8 and make $10.00 to $15.00 a day. Why should people live in penury or suffer hardships for the want of plenty of money when an opportunity of this sort is open?

EASTER MORNING

Nutty — Mealy — Whole

Don't serve Van Camp's unless you want to serve them always.

You can't go back to home-baked beans—broken and mushy—when your people once eat beans nutty and whole.

You can't serve tomato sauce as a mere dressing when they learn what it means to have the tomato sauce baked in.

No more beans that are heavy and hard to digest—baked at 100 degrees. For that is about the temperature inside of your baking dish. When your people once know, they will want their beans baked at 245 degrees, as ours are. They will want the particles so separated that the digestive juices can get to them.

No other brand will satisfy, after you once serve Van Camp's.

We pay $2.10 per bushel to get the best beans grown. Yet beans are sold as low as 30 cents. We spend five times as much to make our tomato sauce as other sauce costs ready-made. But the difference all shows in the flavor and zest.

So don't let your folks know how good beans can be until you are ready to always serve Van Camp's.

Van Camp's pork and beans baked with tomato sauce

But why not serve Van Camp's?

There is no brand worth having that costs any less. And the best beans are cheap enough.

As for home-baking—think of the bother. Van Camp's are always ready. A dozen cans in the pantry mean a dozen meals all cooked. The meals, whenever you serve them, are just as fresh and savory as if served direct from our ovens.

Beans are Nature's choicest food—84 per cent nutriment.

They have the food value of meat at a fraction of the cost.

They should be a daily dish—not an occasional. And see what you would save if they were.

Then why not serve beans that your people will like, and serve them in place of meat?

Prices: 10, 15 and 20 cents per can.

WHEN OUR FLEET VISITS JAPAN

A Missionary Tells of Some of the Curious Sights Our Sailor-Boys Will See Among the Mikado's People

TOURISTS as well as missionaries still find Japan one of the most interesting countries in the world. The officers and crew of our American fleet, when they visit this country, will find it a wonderful study. What with the conglomeration of fashions in dress and customs of living, Oriental and Occidental combined, found in the cities, and even in the interior, amid the thickly dotted towns and villages, where ways and manners are yet so typically old-fashioned and rustic, the observer's interest is never dulled.

The gradual and ever-increasing exchange for Western customs does not appear as humorous to the people here as it does to a stranger. One is liable to see a man on a cold day, with felt hat and a heavy woolen muffler, but with feet and limbs bare nearly to his hips. At another time, when it seems almost warm enough for a foreigner to resort to a straw hat, one may see a native with a big heavy overcoat and the hood over his head, but barefooted on his wooden geta. All this, not because of necessity, but rather a proof that they are still at sea regarding Western styles of dress. This fault is, however, mostly confined to the peasant class. Then it is just as striking to find many city people on festival occasions in foreign clothes, dressed to a fault; though the ladies, as a whole, still cling to their quaint and attractive Japanese attire.

Though the missionary labors with one thing in view—to win the people from their idolatry and to help the native Christians—yet it is but natural for him to take in all these conditions, thus affording a little relief from the constant wear and tear on mind and body. So, whether in the north among the Ainos, or along the jagged coast with the fishermen, as well as among the simple-hearted farmers in the rural districts, there is a sense in which the visitor finds his surroundings as interesting as though he were in Tokyo.

Recently, during the hot season, we visited several mission stations in the more western section of Japan, about 400 miles from Choshi, where we were then located. Traveling by way of Tokyo, on the main railway line, we were struck with the beauty of Japan's mountains and vales, its terraced hills and broad, dashing rivers. There are many tunnels through which these quaint little trains at frequent intervals must pass. The track is hardly ever straight, and is like a trail through the woods. At this season, when the train stops at the principal stations, these hygienic, water-loving Japanese hurriedly flock out of the cars and avail themselves of the benefits of the large lavatories, and again are in their places when the little whistle gives the starting signal.

On the way, we met with another missionary, who was accompanied by an earnest and zealous native evangelist. This man was formerly a Buddhist priest, and the scars which he yet bears witness to his former fanatical devotions, which led him to inflict burns on himself, thus drawing crowds of admiring worshippers. In the morning, as the beautiful sun kissed these Japan islands, I chanced to see a young man standing on the car platform offering prayer to the native gods. With reverently bowed head and clasped hands he stood there, loyal no doubt to his best convictions. We trust that Christ was duly magnified on this train through the distribution of tracts and the singing of gospel songs, which the many travelers heartily appreciated. Amid others, a lawyer earnestly inquired of the missionaries concerning the Christian religion.

What a lovely scene presented itself to our eyes as the train glided through the principal tea-growing section of Japan! From the cars down in the valley below, we saw the hills literally covered with tea shrubs, from two to four feet high, planted in rows. Even up on the higher hills, the little horticulturists were busily engaged cultivating the tea. A sight like this is exceedingly attractive when the tea shrubs are in bloom. The fragrant wax-like flowers are of a soft creamy white and resemble orange blossoms. Soon my friend announced that we were approaching a noted town, whose temple has long been the magnet for many pilgrims. While passing through the place, we saw some in our car standing up and clapping their hands to call the attention of the gods. Then they bowed their heads and made their prayers. Some were still standing as the train pulled out of town. Were any of these devotees ashamed before each other, or even before a foreigner?

After traveling through the ports of Osaka and Kobe, in company with another minister we started to visit a mission station on the noted Awaji Island, where a few months previous a great revival took place. Leaving the mainland we crossed the channel on a steam launch. Here one can often see hundreds of little fishing boats or "sampan," with their square white sails skimming along, all intent on a harvest from the briny waters. We reached the island toward evening, and having great difficulty in securing jinrikishas, which we preferred to the steamboat, we did not get started for Sumoto, our destination, until sunset. By the way, as it was hot, we indulged in a little Japanese ice cream, which is always cheap in this country. It consists simply of ice with the addition of a little soda water and sugar. The ice is shaved fine on a little apparatus similar to a plane. Such a dish is available nowadays almost anywhere in Japan.

At last two countrymen decided to take us half-way—about ten miles. On they came with their dilapidated carts, and we barely got in when they took us whizzing up and down hill. Upon entering a village, our men being unable to find a suitable hotel were forced to take us some miles farther, where we halted in front of a hotel, and engaged lodging for the night. After supper, which was prepared in Japanese style, we were given a native robe apiece, for which we exchanged our clothing, and for a while sat on the porch of the second story outside of our room, in the cooling ocean breeze. Aside from the conversation we were entertained by the roaring of the waves just in front of our inn. Within the hotel there was also some excitement. In one of the adjoining rooms they had a gochiso, a Japanese banquet, where song and mirth mingled with the clapping of hands. In the room opposite there were a number of lodgers who also squatted upon the porch or else upon the mats, smoking their tiny pipes. The inn-keeper brought in the register, in which he requested us to insert our names, ages, nationality, and occupation, and at last we were also honored by a visit from the wide-awake and almost all-seeing Japanese policeman.

Oh, how weary we were that night! But the faithful waters sang us a long lullaby, and we slept soundly. After an early breakfast, another set of jinrikisha men were ready to take us on. Our road still continued along the coast; at times the beach was covered with wagon-loads of little fish, spread there to dry in the sun. Now and then we would pass a native hut, where large piles of little match-boxes, each about an inch and a half in length, were lying on matting, in different stages of construction. Again, coming through a village, a large commons was literally covered with oil-paper umbrellas, which were opened up to dry. Curious sight for a stranger!

But there was yet a little experience ahead of us. We visited our friends in Sumoto, and returning the same day by jinrikisha, we arrived at the boat station some time before sunset, where we meant to board a launch for the mainland. Unfortunately, the last boat had left, and we had only one alternative—either to stay in some tea-house overnight, or get a fisherman to take us across in his sampan. When the ocean is not stormy, there is no danger in crossing in such a way; but my missionary friend knew by experience that our prospective sailing was not altogether safe. However, to save time, we thought we would risk it. Soon after starting, a raging gale came sweeping from the northeast, and whipped our boat constantly to one side. The missionaries, who were sitting in the bottom and holding to the sides with both hands, looked into each other's pale faces, and thought about their little families at home. Oh, how long a time it seemed to take for us to reach the farther shore! At last we could dimly see a faint outline of the coast; now and then almost running into a fishing smack, but still avoiding a clash. With thanksgiving to God, we gladly paid our bills, and with a quick step, cheerfully went our way. But I meant to tell THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers something too about the wonderful skill of the Japanese in ken-jitsu, or fencing, and jiu-jitsu, or wrestling. The chief of police of a certain city accorded me the privilege a few times of attending the regular police drills in these arts. The drills were held at the police headquarters and participated in by the entire force. The instructors are distinctly professional men, who devote their entire time to this work. Besides these, there are some notable champions among the pupils, such as business men and others. Though swordsmanship or fencing is almost a universal affair in Japan, yet its practice among the Japanese is distinctly different from that of other countries. They are remarkably agile and quick-motioned in their strokes. They brandish their long, wooden swords with both hands, and the clash is fierce, and is made more dreadful by constant shrill shouts.

These instructors possess a fine physique, and their constant practice enables them to drill in succession as many as fifty men at a time. Some of them have not only their daily appointments with different police classes, but at night they are engaged with special classes. Ken-jitsu is a time-honored art, an inheritance from the Samurai class. It is prevalent in all the higher schools and colleges; but the military spirit of this entire race is also plainly to be noticed even among the smallest common schoolboys, whose skill in handling a bamboo pole is really remarkable.

Jiu-jitsu (which in Japanese means soft art) does not appear altogether soft when one views the performance. This art is not necessarily obligatory upon the students of the schools, but strictly so upon all police officers. These performances were held in a building adjoining the police headquarters, the floor of which was covered with thick Japanese mats. There is a variety of over eighty different performances embodied in jiu-jitsu, and it takes more than an ordinarily muscular man to make himself proficient in this art. The strength and endurance displayed even among the smallest of these little men is amazing.

SCENES IN PHILADELPHIA'S REVIVAL

THE Chapman-Alexander revival is stirring Philadelphia in a remarkable manner. Between 2,000 and 3,000 people have already confessed Christ, while thousands of church members have been inspired with a new passion for souls. Probably not less than 30,000 daily attend the revival services throughout the city.

One evening recently, Dr. Chapman, his daughter Miss Bertha Chapman, and Mr. and Mrs. Alexander, accompanied by Paul Gilbert, soloist, and Robert Harkness, pianist, conducted two meetings in saloons at the close of their service at Bethany Church, and then held a final meeting from eleven to twelve in a Salvation Army hall, where a large number accepted Christ. On another evening at 11 P.M., Dr. Chapman and Mr. Alexander conducted a meeting at a theatre for the members of a company playing at one of the Philadelphia theatres, and about half the audience remained for the service.

One evening, in the course of a sermon on "Heaven," Dr. Chapman said: "Every end of the child of God is beautiful. Every picture of his going away is peaceful. A man once came to my office and said, 'I will have to ask you to come over and comfort my children. My mother has been living in my house. She has always had the custom of carrying in her hand at night a little lamp, and she had kissed me good-night last night and started away. She came back toward the door and said to us, "Good-night; good-night to you all, for I will see you in the morning." When I called her this morning, she didn't answer. When I opened the door and crossed the threshold, she was lying upon the bed, a sweet smile upon her face; but she had gone home.' Brushing away the tears from his cheeks he said, 'The only thought we have kept of her is this: I will see you in the morning.'"

One of the most interesting of the half hundred evangelists and Gospel singers who are assisting in the revival is Dr. Charles W. Gordon, of Winnipeg, Canada, better known as "Ralph Connor," the author of The Sky Pilot. Dr. Gordon is conducting revival meetings nightly in one of the Philadelphia districts. In addressing the men of an aristocratic church one Sunday morning, he told them that soul-winning work is now going on in his church as never before. Men are organized into a brotherhood, and they are going after unsaved men in a definite business-like manner. In every congregation, the beginning of a new life manifests itself in a new concern for the life of somebody else. "The Christian Church should be composed of men who are getting people to heaven. You will be surprised and delighted, and a new joy will come into your life, to find how many men are waiting for you to say a word about Christ."

Dr. Gordon accompanied the others one night recently when they held services in the saloons of the Tenderloin district of the city. He was deeply interested in their efforts to reclaim the wrecks of humanity they encountered, and a day or two later wrote the following poem on the rescue of the fallen, dedicating it to Mrs. Alexander:

Bring Him to Me

Bring him to me; his heart is filled with madness;
From demon chains ye cannot set him free;
The well of peace, the very spring of gladness,
Is mine. Bring him to me.
Bring him to me; his hurt is past your healing;
From death, from death's black doom you cannot free;
The word of hope, the doom of death repealing,
Is mine. Bring him to me.
Bring him to me, your boy is surely dying;
Life's stream runs low, the dim eyes cannot see;
The fount of life, the cure for all heart sighing
Is mine. Bring him to me.
Bring him to me; day's last sad beams are fading;
Dark night falls thick, and shrouds life's troubled sea;
Look up, the dawning day that knows no shading
Is mine. Come home with me.

ODD CUSTOMS OF EASTERTIDE

TO the Christian people of America there comes a peculiar feeling of brotherhood with those of their faith in other lands, when they think on Easter morning that long before the first streaks of dawn have gladdened the eastern sky, millions of people beyond the sea, in Europe and Asia, have already gone to their churches to worship, and happy voices have cried in greeting: "He is risen, he is risen!" and as the sun sweeps across the sky it is carrying with it the light and joy of the Easter Day.

Though many of the Easter customs are almost universal, and have come down from the days of the early church, yet every country has some ways of celebrating the event that are entirely national in character. Some of the customs strike the American as not entirely religious, though those who participate would be greatly shocked if they were to hear such a criticism.

In the early centuries of Christianity people fasted and prayed, and religious worship was held the night before Easter. Every one who attended these services kept a vigil from the close of the last prayer to cock crowing, the time at which it is supposed that our Lord arose from the tomb. When the first crow of a cock was heard, the people broke into exclamations of joy and repeated to one another the words still used in many places, "He is risen, he is risen indeed!"

The Lord's Supper was usually celebrated with great ceremony, and those who had been prepared for the sacred rite were baptized. Slaves in many instances were freed by their masters, especially where the slave had endeared himself by long and faithful service. Prisoners, generally those not guilty of the higher crimes or crimes against the government, were released by the heads of cities and States so that they also might rejoice with their more fortunate neighbors. The rich made special donations to the poor that all might have the means to take part in the festival and be free for a space of time, at least, from both work and care. Courts were closed and a general feeling of kindness or to another seemed to prevail. In places where there was still a number of heathen living among the Christian population, they were forbidden to celebrate any of their heathen forms of worship, in order that Christians might not be disturbed in their devotions in their celebrations. Within a very few centuries, however, this law became obsolete with the almost universal spread of Christianity in Europe.

The entire week following Easter Day was given up to rejoicing. The people who had been baptized on Easter Day wore robes of white for the seven days following in token of the purity of the life into which they had entered. On the next Sunday the white robes were laid aside and the converts welcomed as members to the church.

In many parts of Germany a very ancient custom survives. It is the celebration on Easter Eve. Bonfires of great size are lit on some of the highest hills, the same spots being used year after year, and the hill near a village where such a fire is burned is often called the Easter Mountain. The peasants firmly believe that so far as the light of the sacred fire may be seen, the fields will be fruitful and the houses will be safe from conflagration, and the people who live in them from sickness.

The flames of these Easter fires are fed by sticks brought by the peasants who wish to take part in the ceremony. When the flames begin to die down, all the people present, from the child of ten to the aged grandfather, jump over the glowing embers, and in a few places the cattle are said to be driven over the ashes. This is supposed, according to the old legends, to protect both the people and the cattle for the year against disease.

Special cakes were baked for Easter throughout

On the Greek Easter Day, which is celebrated according to the old style calendar, one of the most interesting of all religious ceremonies takes place in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. It occurs in the afternoon, usually about two o'clock, and the "Holy Fire," as it is called, is supposed to descend from heaven and hover over the tomb of Christ. This is a reminder to the faithful of his resurrection from the dead, and to the pilgrims it is of the most serious religious import.

A large detachment of Turkish soldiers, sometimes two or three companies, according to the number of pilgrims present, take stations about the church and guard the approach. Their presence is necessary to preserve order between the different sects, for feeling at times runs high. The soldiers form lanes in close order and the officers do not hesitate to hit smartly with their whips any pilgrim who tries to force his way ahead of his companions.

The Chapel of the Holy Sepulchre is a small building of eight sides about twenty-six feet long and seventeen wide. It is directly beneath the great dome of the church. The people crowd about the little chapel leaving only a narrow passage for the procession.

The Greek Patriarch opens the service by marching about the chapel. He is gorgeously robed and wearing the jeweled patriarchal crown. He is followed by a long train of bishops, priests and deacons who are also dressed in elaborate ceremonial robes. They intone chants, but their voices are soon drowned by the strong voices of thousands of pilgrims who take up the chant as the clergy march three times about the chapel. Still, as the chant rises in increasing volume, the Armenian Patriarch joins the Greek Patriarch and they enter the chapel. The Greek priests declare that the Holy Fire descends miraculously from heaven upon the tomb within. A group of athletic men are gathered about the window of the chapel through which the fire is to be handed out to them.

A glowing ball of fire is held out through the chapel window, and the runners light their torches in the flame. Then they dash full tilt toward their respective chapels, Armenian, Abyssinian, Greek, Syriac and Coptic, that are built at various places within the walls of the church. A select corps of men from each sect tries to assist their runners, while the others attempt to extinguish the lights in order that the sacred flame may be placed upon their own altars first. At last all of the chapels have received their fire, and every one in the crowd has lighted his own torch made of twenty or thirty candles.

The pilgrims extinguish their torches and carry them back to their native villages to be used in religious festivals.

In Greece many ancient social customs are revived on Easter week. One of them comes down without doubt from classic days. The youths and maidens assemble in some large open space near their village. The girls who are of marriageable age form in long lines and go through the graceful motions of the "trata," half a march, half a dance. The "trata" signifies that a girl who takes part in it is ready to have a suitor, a sort of debut into Greek village society.

Ceremony of the Holy Fire

Europe during the Middle Ages, and the custom still survives in the "semnel cakes" and the "hot cross buns." The custom of presenting stained or painted eggs is centuries old. Christians adopted the custom to symbolize the resurrection, and at first the eggs were always colored red in allusion to the blood of the redemption.

In Jerusalem itself, the Easter celebrations are the most elaborate of the many that occur on the sacred days in the Holy City. The throngs of pilgrims increase in number during Easter week and the speech of many countries is heard. Hundreds have made their way on foot, with the exception of short stages in the crowded steerage of some steamer or on a railroad.

The Latin churches vie with each other in their elaborate ceremonials, and the Protestant missionaries hold their simpler services of praise and thanksgiving for the Risen Christ.

Proofs of the Resurrection*

AN EASTER SERMON BY REV. C. T. BRADY

WISELY said the Great Apostle, "The fashion of this world passeth away." The whole scheme of it, the mourning, the rejoicing and the rest of it, is this moment sweeping onward like the moving shadow upon the dial. Age succeeds to age as wave to wave. The times change, but we do not change in them. Man in each period plays the same small part. We pursue the same ends; we are moved by the same forces; we fight the same temptations; we think the same thoughts; we love and hate; we live and die. The earth is accompanied in its ceaseless whirl by the same laughter, the same tears. "The grace of the fashion of it perisheth," but nevertheless, "the thing that hath been is the thing that shall be."

This is the age of the temporizer. Expediency and compromise are the watchwords of the time. The wisdom of the world says: Avoid the issue; emphasize the agreeable; bring no burning question to the fore; let sleeping dogs lie; let us have the ethics of Christianity; let us have the consequences of Jesus' life; give us the effects; the cause may be buried in a charitable oblivion.

Such was not the course of the Great Apostle who made known to us "the unsearchable riches of Christ," with a splendor of courage beside which even the boldness of John is little. Paul did not fear to raise the issue in holy Jerusalem, in learned Athens, in sensual Corinth, in lordly Rome. There was no vagueness, no ambiguity, about his position. Though contempt, persecution and death stared him in the face, he would proclaim his Gospel.

In words which ring as true now as when he uttered them, he says: "If Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain. Yea, and we are found false witnesses of God; because we have testified of God that he raised up Christ whom he raised not up."

There are two great facts which evidence the divinity of Jesus, by which we prove that "this Jesus whom I preach to you is Christ." One is the Incarnation; the other the Resurrection. Because of the Resurrection, our confidence in the Incarnation is unshakable.

In our own strong-grounded belief, we wonder at the lack of faith of the disciples before Jesus was crucified. But they had not received that final testimony in which this morning we rejoice. The world pointed to Jesus with bitter cynicism: "Is not this the carpenter's son?" And not even Peter himself was convinced by his own confession, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the Living God." His contemporaries looked upon Jesus' sublime assertion of his divinity as blasphemy, and for that they crucified him. Immediately after his death the disciples walked, with hearts doubly saddened at their own defection and at the seeming failure of their Lord. The resurrection changed all that. And yet, although of transcendental importance viewed by itself, its chief value was its witness to the incarnation. It was the great attestation of the Divine plan, the outward and visible sign, the last word that complemented and completed the angelic annunciation.

Now, in the nature of things, we should have a right to expect that so stupendous a fact, correlated to that other fact which makes so strong a demand upon our faith, should be capable of demonstration. The resurrection of Jesus Christ stands apart from the other dogmas of the Christian Church in that it can be attested by the witness of history. There is more and better evidence for it than for any other contemporary fact dealing with purely secular matters. The resurrection of Jesus is as firmly established as is the death of Caesar.

Let us devote a moment to the witnesses. Upon the character of the witness and his opportunity of information depends the credibility of his testimony. Four men have set forth with much detail the life of Christ, devoting a goodly portion of their several biographies to his apprehension, trial, crucifixion, death, burial and resurrection. Two of these men, Matthew and John, were intimate friends of Jesus; one of them, Mark, a younger man, was the chosen companion of another close friend of Jesus, Peter, whose mouthpiece he became. So that three of the accounts, two actual and one by direct transmission, are those of eye-witnesses to what they describe. The fourth account is a compilation made by Luke, an educated and cultured man of acute perceptions, with a fine historic sense, who prepared his biography by collating many existing accounts which have been lost, testing them by the statements of eye-witnesses and participants in the various events, whom he impartially examined and among whom he judiciously decided. In addition to these, we have the explicit testimony of Paul, to whom exact knowledge came not merely from eye-witnesses, but by direct revelations from God, which he sets forth circumstantially on different occasions.

There is no historic document which has been subjected to such searching criticism as the Bible, and the writings of these men have borne the brunt of the attack. So far as I know, not even the most advanced higher critic is disposed to deny the authorship of ever grappled with the sublimest of subjects, bes whom we can place no other philosopher or theologian. The literary remains of the time are extensive and various, yet there is not in the whole great mass of testimony a single reflection upon the moral character of any one of these men.

So much for the witnesses. What do they say? First and foremost, that Christ really died. Now the attack on the resurrection begins right there. It began right there in Jerusalem. In the Book of the Acts you find no statements from the men who had brought him to crucifixion that Jesus had not risen. They do not attempt to deny that fact after Peter preached the resurrection in Jerusalem; they only commanded silence and strove to secure it by imprisonment. They abandoned the first attempt which they made at a counting for the resurrection almost before they had published it. Modern scepticism, unable to deny the reappearance of Christ, has been forced to repeat the charge that he did not die.

But the testimony to his death is ample and explicit. With a convincing simplicity and correctness, the Evangelists record Pilate's amazement at the fact that Jesus should have died so soon, and the inquiry of the centurion as to the reality of his death. These statements would have been suppressed if he had not died. And, lest the appearance of death which came upon Christ hanging upon the cross after that great and bitter cry should be on the result of a fainting spell, one of the Roman soldiers whose business it was to see that the people whom they crucified did die, and who would not leave them until they were dead, drove a spear through the side and into the heart of the Master. And the chief priests were there on Calvary to see that he was really dead.

Then he was buried. His tomb was closed by a great stone. That stone was sealed by the official seals of the church. It was guarded by a detail of Roman soldiers. No single man could have rolled that stone away and have burst from that tomb.

What happened? The seals were broken; the stone was rolled away; the tomb was emptied of its Occupant. That is universally admitted. The first accounting for this by the priests was that the disciples had come to the sepulchre by night while the soldiers slept and stolen the body away.

Now, one of the things which make us thus more inclined to credit the testimony of the disciples is that they do not hesitate to set down in plain, blunt words their own previous weakness. Of the twelve who accompanied Jesus, one had betrayed him by the most execrable treachery of history; another had denied him, not once but thrice, and the others, with out exception, had forsaken him and fled. They were absolutely crushed by the terrible end of him whom they had loved. To claim that these tremblers took the terrible risk of a like death for the purpose of stealing the dead body of him for whom when alive they could do nothing, is preposterous. And there is further involved an agreement upon an elaborate conspiracy to defraud, which demanded a degree of intellect, a quality of courage and a moral turpitude inconceivable in connection with these men.

Again, if the chief priests had so easily compassed the death of the Leader of the little band, is it at all likely that they would have hesitated to bring the perpetrators of such an open and atrocious deception to similar crosses? They dared not do this because there was absolutely no warrant for the charge; not even their prejudiced minds could manufacture the smallest evidence to support it. The lives of those Roman soldiers who guarded Jesus' tomb would not have been worth an instant's purchase if they had slept upon their watch, even if no consequences had ensued. The discipline of Rome was ruthless and absolute. The story must be dismissed as soon as it is uttered. Indeed, not the most determined opponent considers it to-day.

What do the records say about Jesus on that first Easter Day? He appeared to Mary Magdalene first of all. Next he was seen of certain other faithful women. He vouchsafed a special interview to Peter. Two of the disciples walked with him to Emmaus and recognized him when he broke bread in their house. In the evening he presented himself visibly to the eleven Matthew, of Mark and of Luke. Some have questioned his authorship of the Gospel ascribed to John. They are not agreed as to who did write it, or whence its materials were drawn, but the preponderance of evidence is in favor of the beloved disciple. The writings of Paul have been included in the scrutiny, but it is a singular fact that no critic of reputation has ever ventured to raise a question as to the authenticity of the First Epistle to the Corinthians, in which the resurrection is set forth so distinctly.

Unfortunately, we know but little about the lives of the Evangelists save what they themselves have told us in their writings, but what we do know from history or tradition exhibits them after the resurrection as men absolutely honest, highly courageous and thoroughly imbued with their own Gospel; men in deadly and terrible earnest in their proclamation of it. So far as humanity can say, every one of these men is worthy of the highest credence.

We know more of Paul. His life and work make up a great part of the New Testament. We know what he did, where he went, what he said, how he lived, what kind of a man he was. He poured out his soul in a series of remarkable letters, still extant. We discern in his writings the most powerful intellect which has as they sat at meat in an upper chamber in a house in Jerusalem. With the eleven were others of the disciples, the faithful women and the two who had returned from Emmaus. He appeared again a number of times to individuals and to assemblages of believers during the forty days which intervened between his resurrection and his ascension. And last of all he appeared to Paul. On one occasion he was seen by "above five hundred brethren at once," of whom the greater part were living witnesses, whose testimony was available when Paul wrote his celebrated epistle to the Corinthians, although some, in the words of the great apostle, had "fallen asleep."

His is all exquisitely modest and simple. It is inherently credible, therefore. Liars would have embellished the tale. They would have made the resurrection take place in a blaze of light, at the sound of the trumpets of archangels, with legions of the heavenly host irradiant in glory, the earth quaking and trembling. Instead of which it is all so quiet and so real that it carries conviction on its face. To say that Jesus did not rise is to brand the testimony of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John as a deliberate falsehood. It is equivalent to declaring that Paul wilfully lied when he said that the greater part of the five hundred people who had seen him were still alive. It is simply incredible that any one could maintain in the face of this testimony that, after his death, Jesus did not visibly present himself to the disciples.

Indeed, it is significant that the denial to-day is not a denial of the belief of the truth of these men. The attempt is made to explain away the appearance of the Lord in another manner, and of late the "visionary story" well named, indeed! has come to the fore. It begins with an admission that Christ actually died. Then it goes on to declare that the disciples, earnestly expectant, eagerly awaiting the resurrection, which had been foretold by Jesus while he yet lived, became the victims of hallucination; that they embodied before their eyes by self-hypnosis, by unconscious efforts of a highly stimulated, neurotic imagination, a semblance, which to their distorted and excited minds took the form of Jesus; that they did not really see him for the reason that he did not really rise; but they were so powerfully moved by their own desires and imaginations that they were absolutely persuaded that they had seen him, and, therefore, that he had risen. In other words, they believed that they wanted to believe.

But here again the evidence is explicit. The contention appears to have been foreseen and provided for. In the first place, the disciples did not expect him to rise. On the contrary, the crucifixion was so complete and crushing a tragedy that it left them utterly hopeless, expecting nothing. In the presence of its awful reality, they temporarily forgot all they had been told. Jesus' submission negated pre-conceptions of his origin and mission. Hope was dead. A resurrection was the last thing of which they dreamed. In the second place, while it may be possible that highly wrought, sensitive persons, under such circumstances, could embody their fancy and persuade themselves that "the baseless fabric of a vision" was a reality, that eleven men of different temperaments should have been so deceived, is so improbable that it is unbelievable. And when to these eleven are added varying numbers of others at different times, including in one instance five hundred people, the impossibility of the explanation is demonstrated.

Furthermore, these were plain, simple, every-day people—common people, if you will, for it was they who heard Jesus gladly—hard-working people, tillers of the soil, fishermen, of all others the most unlikely to dream dreams, or see visions. The resurrected Jesus ate and drank with them. He breathed upon them. He offered his wounded hands, his bruised feet, his pierced side, for their inspection. One among the disciples doubted for a time; but he too saw and believed. His confession was complete, absolute and final.

When St. Paul wrote that splendid letter to the Corinthians, Christianity had already aroused the opposition of heathendom. During St. Paul's life, and later during the closing years of St. John, there were men who made it their business to attempt to confute the claims of Christianity. We have references to attacks, as those of Celsus, upon this very fact of the resurrection still preserved in literature with fragments of their work. It is easy to see why Christianity evoked these antagonisms. It was the most aggressive and intolerant of all religions. It was not willing to enter the Roman Pantheon on terms of equality with any other religion whatsoever. It fought all the others. It was a unique religion. It was not one among many, but in the eyes of its followers it was the only one.

Is it conceivable that upon the wide circulation of such a statement as St. Paul made in his epistle to the Corinthians, that there were hundreds of witnesses still alive who could testify to the resurrection of Jesus, the truth could not have been ascertained, and that those inimical to the Christian religion would not have availed themselves of such an opportunity to investigate the truth of this statement and to have branded it as falsehood, which it would have been easy to do if St. Paul had lied? Again, is there a lawyer to-day, who could not extract the truth from five hundred witnesses, howsoever they might conspire to suppress it? And the lawyers and advocates of those days were not less acute than those of our own.

There are very few absolute atheists in the world. They are a negligible quantity, even in this day of scepticism and indifference. Mankind believes and always has believed in God. Also, there has always been some kind of a moral law in human hearts, older far than the decalogue, and varying with race, and place, and time. And one of the innate beliefs of the human mind is that truth is eternal, and that the lie inevitably perishes in the end, however it may flourish for a season. Here are a handful of peasants, in an obscure and unimportant corner of the world, followers of a Man who has been crucified with every possible attendant circumstance of ignominy and contempt. They are simple, plain people. They proclaim a Gospel which deliberately attacks the existing order; which antagonizes religious systems that are bound up with the political fortunes of the Empire whose boundaries were coterminous with civilization and the world. Every

It is stronger to-day than ever. It has gone from strength to strength, from conquest to conquest, from triumph to triumph, until now all that is civilized, all that is enlightened, all that is best among the nations, is Christian—imperfectly Christian, if you will, but decidedly Christian as opposed to pagan. These are facts which cannot be lightly brushed aside. Could this work have been done, could these results have been brought about, if those men had lied, if there had been the faintest deviation from the truth in their proclamation? Would not the lie have been exhibited and disclosed long ago by the opposition which has manifested itself against Christ's Holy Church?

Again, if it were a lie, if the witnessing to the resurrection were the result of a gigantic conspiracy, if the men knew that they were lying when they said that Jesus rose from the dead, if they were deliberate in their proclamation of a falsehood, with such means as they had at their command, with such methods as they used, how could they have produced the results?

And again, suppose the Apostles believed that they saw Jesus, although they did not really see him. That belief might have animated them to heroic endeavors, and they might have died in it, but under such circumstances could they and their successors have accomplished their work? For, however a man may be deluded, if the truth be not in him, his work will not endure. There may be no moral turpitude attached to him, but his work will be a failure. The only demonstration of a Gospel is that it is true.

The resurrection of Jesus is an assured fact. Why is it, then, that men do not recognize it? They are afraid to do so. They dare not. Mere intellectual assent to the fact is not sufficient. Men instinctively, even from an inadequate conception of the work and ministry of Jesus Christ, realize that no mental acceptance of him suffices. Acknowledgment is not sufficient. It must be followed by confession. The instant the resurrection is admitted, the claim of Christ to be an Arbitrator of human character necessarily must also be admitted. For the resurrection carries with it the incarnation, which involves recognition of Christ's divinity. When that is admitted, conformity to the teachings of Christ as exhibited in his Word and proclaimed by his Church of necessity follows. And that is the reason why men to-day harden their hearts and refuse to acknowledge Christ as the Son of God, Christ as the human-divine person in the Blessed Trinity. That is the reason why they are willing to take the ethics of Christ, or the philosophy of Christ, or the teachings of Christ, or the writings of Christ, and yet withhold their assent to the divinity of Christ.

There can be no effect without a cause; there can be no sharing of effects, in the spiritual world, without participation in the cause. The confession of the resurrection is the confession of the incarnation; the confession of the incarnation is the confession of all of the obligations of a Christian. These they will not assume. They prefer anything, everything to those obligations. "Ephraim is joined to his idols, let him alone."

Look to it, ye idle, ye careless, ye fashionable, to-day; look to it, O Vanity Fair! beware how you reject your risen Lord. You are not merely refusing to acknowledge a fact; you are determining your own eternal future. When you are sick, when you are troubled, you want Christ's Gospel and Christ's minister. When you lie in a flower-shrouded casket in some bereaved home, those you leave behind you crave the assurance of Christ's Gospel from Christ's minister. When you look with tear-dimmed eyes upon those who go before—and no one passing adolescence lives so shortly but what some one goes before—you long to be told that there is a blessed home hereafter; that all is not over; that the parting is but for a moment; that "thy brother," in the very words of Christ, "shall rise again."

Brethren, "my heart's desire and prayer unto God for Israel is that they might be saved." That is the prayer of every priest, every preacher of every church. This is "the word of faith, which we preach: That if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved. For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation." "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." Those were the last words of the Divine, the Compassionate, the Loving Son of God upon the earth, ere he went to that place prepared for him from the beginning, where he awaits us, where we shall join our risen Lord, if we be his children. And it is my last word this Easter Day, which will be the last Easter for some who read this.

Christ did die; Christ did rise; Christ is risen! "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved."

I ASKED a little boy at play,
When Winter's chill had passed away,
What made the sky so soft and blue—
Why all things seemed so changed and new?

"This day," he said, "is Easter morn,
And I upon this day was born;
So, where the Easter blossoms grow,
Through fragrant fields for them I go."

He knew the story, broad and free,
From Bethlehem and Galilee;
And felt his life, in some fair guise,
Was linked to their long-hallowed skies.

He crossed the meadows wet with dew;
The violet's choicest nooks he knew;
But did not miss the spell divine
That came to him from Palestine.

One little child, in springtime hours,
Came home with burdened arms and flowers,
And said: "I've gathered these in play,
To celebrate this Easter day."

Warm faith and hope are manifold—
The Master's love is simply told—
And down the lengthening path of years,
More beautiful its reign appears.

hand is against them; every voice decries them; every government persecutes them.

The foundation-stone of their Gospel is the statement that their Crucified Leader rose again from the dead; that he was alive and will remain alive. They point to that as the final proof of the truth of their claim that he was Divine, and that his teaching ought, therefore, to be followed. Nothing so preposterous had ever been heard. There were, indeed, legends of other resurrections; but they were the slow growth of centuries, and had their rise in obscure and long-forgotten periods. These men stood forth, as it were, and said this resurrection took place to-day.

Furthermore, to oppose to the cruel antagonisms and oppressions which their teachings evoked, they offered nothing except a continued insistence upon the truth of what they said. They organized no parties in the State; they did not make use of any political means; they had no army; they simply went tirelessly on bearing witness to this one fact and saying: All we teach and preach and believe is evidenced by, and depends upon, our statement that this resurrection did take place. And they died unresistingly by thousands, confident in the truth of their position.

Look at the two parties in the great controversy—Rome and the world against the handful of Christians! Search the lordly pages of Gibbon for magnificent periods which describe the might and majesty of that Empire. Read the sweet and tender words of Christ to find the characteristics of that opposition. And yet the Empire could no more stay the spread of the Gospel than Canute upon the shore could check the rising tide. But unlike the tide, the onward sweep of Christianity has had no ebb. It suffered from every possible antagonism, outward and inward, alike from persecution and from the weakness of its members, who frequently have been its deadliest enemies. Yet it lived. It lives. It shall live.

AMERICA'S NEW BIBLE CONFERENCE

AMERICA is to have another Summer Bible Conference that gives promise of being world-wide in its reach. What Northfield has been to the East, and what Winona has been to the middle West, that will Montrose, for so is the new Conference named, be to the wide stretch of intervening territory that lies midway between the well-worked fields of these two other Conferences.

The leader of the new Conference will be Rev. Reuben Archer Torrey, D.D., the evangelist. As showing the strange providences of God and his undoubted leadership in the selection of Montrose for the Conference seat, it need only be mentioned that Dr. Torrey had examined site after site in his "around the world" journey without finding that which met his ideal for a Conference centre—the establishment of a Conference had been upon his heart for several years—until in a very unique and unusual way he was called to Montrose for a day. During that stay he found the spot he wished for. One by one the obstacles melted away, and the Conference plan began to assume definite proportions. Stranger than all, four other Christian leaders on whose hearts projects of a kindred nature had been laid were unconsciously drawn together in fellowship. These forces are all joined in this one undertaking, and Montrose gives promise of becoming a headquarters for aggressive Christian activity within the next year or two at farthest.

Montrose is the county seat of Susquehanna County, Pennsylvania, and is an ideal country town with a population of about 2,000. It is noted for its solid prosperity and the intelligence of its citizens, who are descendants of the old New England Puritans. The town is about 2,000 feet above sea level, and its climate rivals the best to be found in the Adirondacks. It has two railways—the Lackawanna and the Lehigh Valley. It is easy of access from Scranton, Wilkes-Barre, Pittston, Binghamton, Elmira, Buffalo, and the cities of New York and Philadelphia. It is in every way an ideal summer spot and some of the best people in Philadelphia and New York have summer homes here.

The Montrose Bible Conference Association has al-

Bible Conference for a special study of the Bible for the purpose of deepening the Christian life, and for inspiring greater and more aggressive efforts for the evangelization of the masses at home and abroad. A school for Bible and missionary training, and a school for boys and girls will also be features in a few years. There will also be made a centre for developing interest in Sunday School, Young People's Societies and Christian Association work, and will provide for Summer School of methods along these lines.

The Association has purchased one of the most beautiful sites in Montrose. The farm, a part of which is within the town limits, contains about 17 acres and overlooks an ideal spring lake.

The Bible Conference for 1908 will be held on August 21-30.

Among others, the following are to take part in the programme: Dr. R. A. Torrey, Montrose, Pa.; Dr. A. C. Dixon, Chicago, Ill.; Dr. J. Shean Holden, London, Eng.; Major Cole Rev. H. Frost, Philadelphia, Pa.; Dr. Harris H. Gregg, St. Louis, Mo.; Rev. W. Jacoby, Chicago, Ill. Prof. D. B. Tower will have charge of the music.

Various other smaller conferences are already being arranged for. A permanent auditorium with a seating capacity of 3,000 is being prepared.

Dr. Torrey has bought a residence in Montrose, one of the most beautiful spots in the village, a mile distance from the Conference grounds, and here he will make his all-the-year-around home, commencing with next October.

Hotel bookings, reservations for tenting, and inquiries regarding any other details will have attention addressed to the Secretary, Rev. John M. MacInnis, Montrose, Pa.

A YOUNG GIRL PREACHER IN NEW YORK CITY PULPITS

ALICE HEYWOOD BURGOYNE is perhaps the youngest woman who has ever spoken from the pulpit of an orthodox American Protestant church. On Sunday evening, March 22, she delivered an address at an uptown Baptist church, and the following Sunday she spoke at the Olney M. E. Church, both in New York City. She is the only child of Mr. and Mrs. John L. Burgoyne, prominent residents of the Borough of the Bronx. Miss Alice is about sixteen years old, intellectually bright, responsive, extremely well poised for a girl of her age.

"My speaking in the pulpit came about unexpectedly," she said to the writer. "One day father and I were having a discussion about revival meetings. I think revivals wake some people up as nothing else would do; but there is a class who have to be appealed to through their reason. Finally father said, 'Alice, you write it out and give it at prayer meeting.' So I did. I wrote the kind of argument I thought would interest those who are reading and thinking along religious and philosophical lines, and when I showed it to him he took it to the minister, and the minister asked me to give it Sunday night from his pulpit. That's the way it all came about."

Miss Burgoyne delivered her address without notes, and the church was packed with people who wanted to hear what so young a preacher had to say. She spoke for nearly forty minutes on the subject of "Creation."

"I studied my manuscript carefully beforehand,"

Alice Burgoyne, the Child Preacher

the young woman continued, "but when I got up into the pulpit I couldn't have told what I was going to say. Just as soon as I began, however, the ideas and the words to put them in flowed out. It was like the Bible, 'Out of the fulness of the heart the mouth speaketh.'"

"I have always been interested in spiritual and moral things, and I am studying all the time to try to find what is the truth about everything that we see and experience, and it seems to me that the trouble with the churches and religion to-day is that their teaching isn't made vital. There is too much creed and ceremony, while the religion of Christ should be living—the living truth as he preached and practised it. We can't just say—we believe things—we've got to understand them—work them out in our daily lives."

Miss Burgoyne was educated in the public schools and entered High School; but her mental development was greater than her physical strength, so that her parents were forced to take her out and let her get her education through other means, without the pressure of school discipline. She has read a great deal during the last few years—books far beyond the comprehension of the average girl of her age. She has always been a lover of the Bible and reads it frequently. Later, she means to follow a definite course of study which will give her mind a more systematic training.

Unlike some so-called "infant prodigies," Alice Burgoyne is quite gay and childlike; gentle and loving to her parents and friends, and pleased with the simple pleasures that make the ordinary girl happy. It will be very interesting to watch the development of so unusual a character. With so many natural gifts and good traits, she promises to grow into a woman who will be known for her strength and good works.

They are now being excavated and it is expected that much valuable information may be gathered concerning the modes of worship and the beliefs of the early Christians, and possibly documents of great historic value relating to the primitive church may be brought to light.

—MISS JENNIE SMITH, railroad evangelist, is holding revival meetings at Roanoke, Va., under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A., and is doing a good work among the railroad men and their families. Many conversions are reported.

—A GRACIOUS UNION REVIVAL has just closed at Macomb, Ill., under the leadership of Evangelist C. Fenwick Reed, of Greencastle, Ind., and his singer, C. C. Grant. The Presbyterian church, seating 1,500 people, was crowded nightly, and overflow meetings were held in the Methodist and Presbyterian churches. Five hundred seekers entered the inquiry room and 350 confessed Christ.

—MISSIONARY H. LOOMIS writes from Yokohama, Japan, that the distribution of the Scriptures in Japanese is going on actively in the military camps, schools and hospitals, the leper hospitals and the institutes for the blind. Many notable conversions through the reading of the Word are reported. There are 500 Korean students in Tokyo, under a strong Christian leader; 120 of the Koreans are believers. Of 3,000 Chinese students now in Japan, Mr. Loomis declares, 250 have publicly avowed their purpose to become Christians. A church with 60 members has been organized.

THE HEART OF McCLOSKY'S BOY

AN EASTER STORY BY ADELINE TESKEY

HE was brought up in a small country village, and was, therefore, unacquainted with the advantages and artificialities of the city. He knew by the touch of his bare feet all the interesting nooks and corners around his home within a radius of five miles. More than once he had acted as guide to city people who were spending their summer in the village, when they were willing to follow his lead through marsh and over fen, to see the dams which were built by the beavers when the country was lower. The whiffs of fragrance from the clover meadows, the hallelujah chorus of the million bees in the apple blossoms, the fiddling of the grasshopper, the piping of the cricket, the songs of the birds and the laughter of the brooks were all familiar joys to him. He loved all the living things in the whole-hearted unreserved way in which a boy can love. He could discern the footprints of the fox, the weasel, the ground-squirrel or other marauder which visited the hencoops of the village; and he often chuckled in his secret heart at their sly maneuvers.

But more than anything else in God's outdoors McClosky's boy loved the birds. He had climbed trees almost as soon as he could walk, to peep into the nests; he had carried the young birds many a time in his smutty little hands to save them from the cats; he had put them back in their nests when they had accidentally fallen out; he had learned to imitate many of their calls, and knew more about their fascinating ways than any other boy in the neighborhood. It was his delight to listen to the pewee's "one sweetly solemn thought" rising up with the night hists; and when it grew darker, the whippoorwill's plaint, or the startling "whoo-oo-oo-o" of the owl. He even had, on more nights than one, heard bird-songs in his dreams.

There were occasions on which he had wished that the schoolhouse would burn down—he had dreamed several times of looking on that delightful conflagration—and thus allow him at least the space of time that it would take to build another schoolhouse, to live in the bird world. But despite this delinquency, he had made admirable progress with his studies; when but thirteen he had passed all the examinations which admitted him to a higher grade school than was to be found in the village. The schoolmaster was very proud of his prodigy, and as the boy's parents were poor, he succeeded in getting some of the well-to-do people interested enough in the lad to send him off to a city school.

The boy was to enter the city school after Easter, but as the village schoolmaster was going to the city the Saturday before, it was thought that the boy should accompany him, and have his assistance about procuring a boarding place. The master returned that evening, leaving the lad among strangers for the first time in his life.

McClosky's boy had been brought up to go to church, so, the next morning being Sunday, he donned his one white shirt, which his mother had warned him to keep for such occasions, brushed his suit that had to serve alike Sundays and week-days, and was ready.

As he was walking down stairs from his room, he heard the lady of the house say: "This is Easter Sunday, and every woman will have on a new Easter hat or bonnet." Somehow this piece of information had a depressing effect on McClosky's boy, and he said within himself, "If they're goin' to be so all-fired dressed up, I won't go." So, when he thought himself unnoticed, he slipped out of the house, and wandered off to make friends in this great lonesome city with the cats and the dogs, and the birds—if he could find any.

He had not gone far before he heard music. "There is in music something that traverses the ear as a door, the reason as a vestibule, and which goes yet further." With McClosky's boy it had gone "further." He found himself strangely tranquilized and attracted. He entered the church from whence the sweet sounds were proceeding; pushing one of the doors covered with crimson cloth, which opened from the vestibule into the audience room, he discovered that the audience had not yet assembled, and that an old gray-haired man was playing the pipe-organ. The attractive power of the music kept growing stronger and stronger, and he crept quickly and silently into one of the back seats.

It was the first time McClosky's boy had ever heard a pipe-organ, and the deep, subtle melody touched chords within his being of which he never before had been conscious. The instrument sang, laughed, wept, prayed and agonized under a master hand, and McClosky's boy thought of home, mother, heaven and all the good and beautiful things that had ever come into his life; and he wished, yea, longed, to be better than he was.

This mood was dispelled by the incoming congregation. He soon found himself seated behind an exceedingly well-dressed throng of men and women. He could scarcely see the organist any longer, being a stocky little fellow, with plumed hats and high bonnets

That's a cuckoo," he continued, turning to another bonnet: "I can't see its feet with all them ribbons, but it oughter have two toes in front an' two behind. Don't sing much, but makes a noise like a tree-toad; builds his nest in a low bush, an', like enough, poor codger, that's how he came to get ketched. He lives near streams generally, an' my goodness! if he don't eat caterpillars!—an' if there ain't a hull flock of leetle weenchy hummin'-birds!"

McClosky's boy came near forgetting that he was in a place where his thoughts should dwell on holy things, so wrought up were his feelings, and almost spoke his thoughts aloud.

"Och! I call that mean to take advantage of them leetle fellers—not much bigger than a bum-bee! I've seen 'em dippin' them long bills into the honey-suckle on the schoolmaster's veranda at home, an' drawin' the honey out by the—" he stopped as though his vocabulary failed to supply a word. "How in the mischief did she ketch so many of 'em? I've tried over an' over ag'in, an' I never could ketch one. Wouldn't 'a' killed it if I had; jest took a good look at it—my, how its little heart would thump—an' then let it fly away. I mind the little wee nest in the hickory I climbed once—all lined with fluffy bits o' cat-tails, soft as a feather-bed, all fixed over on the outside as nice as you please, jest exactly like the bark on a tree—an' there's a song-sparrow, 'pon my word! on that woman's hat, with his head perked up as if he was lookin' up into the sky an' askin' God not to let her ketch him. Wonder if he'll sing again. They say there'll be lots o' singin' in heaven. Wonder if song-sparrows, an' canaries, an' catbirds, an' fly-catchers will do any of it?"

Here McClosky's boy looked dreamy and reminiscent; his eyes wandered away from the bonnets toward a stained-glass window in the end of the church, a work of art which was intended to be a representation of the stoning of Stephen.

"They killed him, too," whispered McClosky's boy sorrowfully, "cause they was bigger an' stronger than him. Men did it. . . . Men an' women are both cruel," he added philosophically.

His eyes soon came back to the bonnets. "I swan," he continued, "if there ain't a gray-and-white phoebe—an' a grosbeak—an' a gull!"

He let his eyes rest a moment while he thought of some barbarous tribes he had read about in some of his school-books that adorned their gate-posts and the palings around their inclosures with the heads of men.

"There's a blue-jay," he said, again turning his attention to the bonnets, an' a blackbird, an' a robin, an' a little yellow-hammer, an'—" He was craning his neck for another look at what he thought was some new kind of bird, when he caught the eye of a church official fixed sternly upon him. He straightened up, and tried to remember that he was in the house of God.

The church had been wonderfully decorated with flowers for this day of days; their perfume filled the place like incense; the choir had given some of its grandest Easter music; the minister had preached a sermon of great resurrection power; but McClosky's boy went out from that church feeling depressed. He hadn't heard a word of the sermon—did not even know the text.

"I s'pose it was for their Easter hats an' bunnets they killed all them birds," he said moodily. "Och, Easter!" with a little shudder at the thought of so many of his dead favorites. "I'll never come to church again!" he added fiercely. "I'll chuck a cracker biscuit into my pocket Sundays an' go out into the park an' feed 'em; the robins 'll eat anyhow, an' after a while the sparrows, an' p'raps the bluebirds.

"I'll go when I get back to the village," he added, as his conscience gave him a twinge when he remembered how his mother had always insisted on his church-going.

"He caught the eye of a church official fixed upon him" obstructing his view. He had to crane his neck painfully to catch a glimpse of the minister. It required such an effort to keep his mind on the sermon, when he could not see the minister, that he gave up the attempt, and turned his attention to what he could see.

The birds and wings on the women's bonnets and hats were the most noticeable things within his line of vision.

"That kind," he said to himself, eying a bird on a bonnet in front of him, "builds its nest in the crotch of a tree, up high—wonder how she ketched him." (McClosky's boy was not at all skilled in the secrets of millinery, and had a vague idea that each woman in some way had snared the bird that adorned her bonnet.) "Lines it all with some soft downy thing, most like silk, an' lays five eggs—leetle speckled fellers. Sits on the top of a Norway spruce, an' sings like sixty—specially when it's thunderin' an' lightenin'.

The High Tide of Easter

SHADOW and sunlight, ebb and flood, mourning and rejoicing are not more opposite than the subdued and sorrowful mood befitting Lent, and the triumphant gladness of Easter. As Good Friday, in its solemn passing, recalls to us the day when the darkness of the cross made the sun ashamed to shine, so Easter Sunday, with a supreme radiance, indicates the hour that is the coronation of humanity. Jew and Roman combined in the crucifixion of Him who came to save, but they could have had no power against him had he not willingly offered himself to atone for the sins of the world. "I am the good shepherd," he said. "I lay down my life for the sheep. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again." No mere man could have made that divine assertion.

Well might the sun in darkness hide
And shut his glories in,
When God, the mighty Maker, died
For man, the creature's sin.

Christ died, and we must die. There is an hour in the unseen future known to God, but unknown to us, when our friends and kindred will say of us, one by one, "He is gone." "She is not here." But Christ rose again from the dead, and so shall we. We shall live again, not in this poor world of change and loss, but in a far more beautiful one, into which death cannot enter.

Because Christ lives, we shall live. This is the joy of Easter, and this is why when Lent is over and winter is past and spring has returned, Christian life reaches its highest water-mark on the shores of time in an exultant Alleluia that reverberates around the globe.

Ill-Assorted Marriages

OUR New York up-State correspondent, whose letter, published in this journal several weeks ago, stirred up the present controversy over the subject of ill-assorted marriages as a leading cause of poverty, has given in a second communication a fuller explanation of her views on this timely question. That the subject is a vital one must be generally admitted. This second letter, which we print below, shows that the writer has the courage of her convictions and the ability to present them clearly and logically. The essential part of her communication is as follows:

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

This question has come up several times in different papers: how to better the condition of the very poor. The same answer has always occurred to me—by law. People for a long time have been trying to better their condition by help and education, without much result so far. They are perfectly willing to be helped, and, nine times out of ten, just as willing to stay where they are.

I will divide the poor into three classes: First—Those who are sober and industrious, who always have a comfortable living and home, and who never know what poverty is, and are never called "poor," except by themselves, when they meet with a little discouragement. They are mostly people who have begun married life with some property or had good luck from the first, and in time have become well-to-do. Second—Those who can work but won't, only just enough to exist. Third—Those who can work but won't; or who are industrious, but spend all or nearly all they earn at the saloon or on some other folly. It is the last two classes the people have to deal with. They are the poor who fill our orphan asylums, children's homes and the slums, and who are the cause of all our moral labor. If these people are so inhuman and destitute of all honor as to marry and bring innocent children into the world (when they can't or won't take care of them), to be turned adrift, to learn and endure all kinds of vice and misery, then there ought to be a law to stop it. They also fill our jails, penitentiaries and State prisons. Should such people marry?

Not all poor people drink, yet the saloons are our greatest evil. If one man ruined another in any other way but by selling him liquor he would be locked up; yet a saloonkeeper and those who make the liquor can ruin a whole nation, and there is no law to stop it. Liquor is so impure, it is not fit even for medicine. I do not believe prohibition will ever entirely do away with it in the cities. There are too many ways to evade the laws—the more shame to such laws!

Every man looks forward to marriage some time. If he were compelled to have $2,000 before he married, it would stimulate the desire for work and thrift. Men who were too indolent to try would not be worthy of marriage, and if they people together without being married, they should both be locked up for life at hard labor.

Men who are destitute of acquisitiveness ought to be destitute of the desire to marry. God never planned for men and women to marry and bring children into the world (if they could not take care of them), to suffer cold and hunger and misery. He endowed them with the power to know right from wrong. If they choose the wrong they ought to suffer—not the children. Men who begin married life with property don't become public charges as often as those who begin with nothing. I should think we have proof enough of that. A single man who earns $10 or $12 per week and doesn't save $200 per year, girls ought to refuse as a husband. No wonder celibacy is prevalent! A great many girls are beginning to realize that "single blessedness" is better than married poverty and misery. Some young men save their wages, and some young women, too, toward a home and don't get married till they are twenty-five or thirty. They are all the better and happier for it, and are not ready for a divorce the first year, because they have learned to know each other better, and whom they wanted, and whom they did not. If men can't save anything before they are married, how can they afterwards on the same salary?

We make new laws for other things. Why not make a law to better the condition of the two last named classes? As for vice, marriage doesn't stop that. A good strict law with no escape; no more saloons, and no more marriages till men can support families, would in a few years wipe out the slums, turn our asylums into first-class schools, empty our prisons, and make a prosperous, happy people. There would be some hard kicking against such a law at first; but after they were forced to live a better and honorable life, they would be glad of it.

Knox, N. Y.

In another part of this issue we print a number of letters from readers who discuss the main proposition. Like a prairie fire in dry weather, this remarkable discussion seems destined to spread on every hand. Let us hope that some substantial good may come of it, although we confess that such an expectation is almost equivalent to looking for a complete transformation of the weaker side of human nature.

Sowing Dragons' Teeth

IT is not an easy matter to determine to what extent the preaching of the dangerous "gospel of discontent" is responsible for the growth of anarchism in this country. Wherever it has been persistently dinned into the ears of the masses, it has invariably produced just such incidents as those lately witnessed in Chicago and New York. In the former city, the Chief of Police apparently saved his life by a narrow margin, his assailant being a wretched refugee from Kishinev, only a short time in America, and who had been a pliant tool in the hands of shrewder plotters. In the New York case, again, we find that the immediate perpetrator of the Union Square outrage, mutilated by his own bomb, was a refugee who had come to this country to escape from Russian tyranny.

Anarchists will continue to come here until our national legislature perceives the wisdom of taking measures which will exclude absolutely, not only the violent class, but many others as well. Indeed, the whole question is largely dependent upon the proper regulation of immigration. To adopt repressive measures after the manner of European governments would simply increase the evil. Further, to deny to any body of citizens, native or naturalized, the rights of free assemblage, free speech and a free press, would be to assail the underlying principles of American institutions and might lead to evils greater than we need now contemplate. But when freedom runs to license; when free speech is perverted to preaching disorder, riot and assassination; then the strong arm of the law should be stretched out to restore order and to properly restrain or punish the disturbers.

It would seem, unfortunately, that there is no law far-reaching enough to touch those who, with voice and pen, on platform and in press, are sowing the seeds of discontent in the minds of the multitudes. These sowers of strife are to-day among the worst enemies of the Republic. Like the dragons' teeth sown by Jason, the seed they are now industriously scattering may yet spring up into armed foes, to confront and confound them—a hostile force that might be difficult to subdue.

The Evangelistic Field

THERE is promise of unusual activity among the forces of evangelism during the coming summer. Everywhere the soul-winners are getting into line for aggressive work against the common enemy. New combinations mark the opening of the campaign. In Philadelphia, Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman and the singing evangelist, Charles M. Alexander, have united and, aided by a large body of local pastors and experienced workers, are holding meetings of a magnitude and fervor never before witnessed in the Quaker City. Ralph Connor, of Sky Pilot fame, has come down from his Canadian forests to lend his eloquent co-operation to the movement.

Dr. Torrey, now a white-haired veteran and for many years a co-worker with that prince of evangelists, Dwight L. Moody, is at the head of another powerful organization, which includes some highly successful soul-winners. W. A. Sunday, probably the most picturesque and vigorous of present-day evangelists, is doing phenomenal work in the West, where his labors have been blessed with thousands of conversions. Already preparations are well-nigh completed for the resumption of summer tent preaching in New York and other cities.

It is evident from the activity on all sides that the Gospel army, which is carrying the message of salvation to the non-church-going masses this year, will be numerically stronger and better equipped than in any previous season. Their battles against sin will be duly chronicled in the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and they will have the earnest prayers of its readers that their effort may be rewarded with a great harvest of precious souls.

India's Impending Famine

ONE of the few shadows that mar the brightness of this joyous Easter season is caused by the famine cloud which overhangs India. Our missionary letters from the Punjab and the United Provinces are filled with gloomy forebodings. Even while the workers are preaching to the people and pleading with them to forsake their idols, starvation and misery increase.

Famine's existence is now officially admitted by the Government. Relief works upon a large scale have been established, and generous appropriations made in aid of the hungry multitudes; but these are wholly inadequate to stem the tide of suffering. There is a slender hope that conditions may take a turn for the better before July next. If they do not, then nothing short of providential interposition can save India from a repetition of the horrors of the last two great famines.

Many of our readers, knowing these facts, have written urging us to make appeal in India's behalf. Indeed, some of them express surprise that we should not have done so months ago. We would remind these friends that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD invariably makes the fullest investigation before taking such a step, in order to justify any appeal. In the present case we have been investigating India's condition for many months. The Governor-General has admitted the prevalence of serious conditions.

Our missionaries are already appealing to us for help to save their dying people. The Secretary of State for India cables us that aid sent to India now should be distributed through the missionaries. If any of our readers are disposed to lay an Easter offering on the altar for India, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will forward all such gifts to the missionaries in the stricken districts, to enable them to meet the present emergency in the same sympathetic and efficient manner in which they fought previous famines: by feeding the hungry and clothing the naked. Let us hold up the hands of those faithful workers by every means within our power. May a brighter day soon dawn for unhappy India.

Honoring a Heroine

THE highest honor in the gift of the city of London, the presentation of "the freedom of the city," was recently conferred on Miss Florence Nightingale. The venerable lady, whose services to the sick and wounded in the Crimean War made her famous the world over, is now a helpless invalid. A few weeks ago the King made her a member of the newly instituted "Order of Merit," and now the city of London has followed his example in honoring her. It is customary on such occasions for the Lord Mayor to put the coveted document in a richly chased gold casket, which costs the civic authorities over $500. Miss Nightingale, however, intimated to them that she would prefer to receive the document in a plain oak casket, and if the corporation desired to expend the usual sum, it would gratify her if it could be given to a hospital in which she was interested. The corporation cheerfully complied and a check representing the difference in the value of the caskets was enclosed with the document. Miss Nightingale was prevented by age and infirmity from attending the Guild Hall to receive the honor, but her nephew was deputed to represent her and expressed on her behalf the gratification the presentation afforded her. The city Chamberlain, in the course of an eloquent speech glorifying the services the devoted lady had rendered in the Crimea, naively referred to the long interval which had elapsed between her service and its recognition. He said: "We regret that owing to some unexplained omission on the part of a previous generation, the honorary freedom—the highest honor in the gift of the corporation—was not conferred upon her half a century ago, when she was in health and strength, and able thoroughly to appreciate and enjoy it." They are to be congratulated on the fact that their recognition, tardy as it is, was not delayed until death had removed the object of it. The delay is not a modern characteristic; the Preacher noted something of the kind in his day.

Now there was found in it a poor wise man, and he by his wisdom delivered the city; yet no man remembered that same poor man. Then said I, wisdom is better than strength; nevertheless the poor man's wisdom is despised. (Eccles. 9: 15, 16.)

From an early portrait

Miss Florence Nightingale

answer has been a haughty and insolent refusal, and general defiance. This conduct is the more remarkable because Venezuela has relied on our friendship and protection in its disputes with European powers. It will be remembered that during President Cleveland's term this protection was exercised to an extent that brought us to the verge of war with England in Venezuela's cause. Our Government is therefore entitled to at least courteous treatment from Venezuela, rather than the arrogant attitude President Castro assumes. The matter is serious, for if the powers of President Roosevelt are enlarged by Congress, Venezuela must suffer for the obstinacy of the man whom she places in control of her affairs. Complaints have been made against him by many European powers and he has sheltered himself under our protection, but the patience of the world is now nearly exhausted and he should beware.

Scornful men bring a city into a snare; but wise men turn away wrath. (Prov. 29: 8.)

Torpedo Becomes Boomerang

A curious accident has befallen the torpedo boat Blakeley, which has been engaged in target practice off Pensacola, Fla. A torpedo fired from her own tube turned in a semi-circle, and struck her, doing serious harm. The torpedo had been prepared for a range of 4,000 yards, fitted with the new gyroscope and fired. It had only gone about one hundred yards, when it suddenly swerved, and after making a half circle came directly toward the Blakeley. Seeing that the torpedo would strike the boat, full steam ahead was ordered, but the Blakeley failed to get out of the way. The torpedo struck on the port side aft, about one foot below the water line, tearing a jagged hole in her hull. Mattresses and bedding were used to stop the inrush of water, and the vessel headed for the navy yard. When she arrived at that point there were three feet of water in her compartments. An investigation showed that the gyroscope, which was supposed to control the torpedo's rudder, had not acted. This was an accident which is little likely to occur again, but it is an illustration of the effects of war. Deadly weapons have a recoil, and the victor suffers with the vanquished.

They that take the sword shall perish with the sword. (Matt. 26: 52.)

The Halo a Fact

A treatise has recently been published in Paris by Dr. Fere, an eminent French physician, describing a recent photographic discovery. It is a scientific fact, he says, that there are certain conditions of the human mind and nervous system when a halo, such as the old artists used to put around the heads of saints in their pictures, actually exists. He had occasion to have one of his patients in the hospital photographed, and was astonished, when the photographer showed him the negative, to see a ring of soft orange light surrounding the head. Later, having considered this case, he determined to have another patient photographed. This was a neurasthenic, whose emotional state became at times exceptionally intense. He waited for one of those periods and then had a photograph taken. There were distinctly visible luminous rays, several inches in length, proceeding from his forehead and the sides of his head. Experiments were made with other patients, and it was found that the halo was always present in various degrees under similar conditions. This manifestation is due to pathological causes, but there is another glory which not even the photograph discloses, which is reflected from Him who is all glorious.

Beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory. (II. Cor. 3: 18.)

Wasted Wealth

A startling prediction was made recently before a committee of the House of Representatives by a mining engineer from Colorado. He was advocating the creation of a special bureau to have charge of mining interests. Such a bureau, he contended, with resources to employ experts to travel around the country in an effort to collect data which might be used in evolving improved methods and processes of mining, would discover materials which, when properly treated, would yield mineral wealth from millions of tons of ore that now go to waste. He mentioned in illustration of his theory the product of radium, now extremely rare and costly. He believed that radium, worth billions, would ultimately be discovered in the United States, if proper inquiries were directed by the government. His own researches had convinced him that deposits from which radium could be extracted now lie undiscovered in many States of the West. If there is really such a possibility, a bureau will probably be speedily organized. The hint ought not to be lost on the churches. All around us, in every State and city, is there material now running to waste, out of which true Christians might be made.

Let him know that he who converteth a sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death. (James 5: 20.)

A Funereal Dwelling

A tourist recently returned from Europe describes a curious dwelling which he saw in Southern France, near the Spanish frontier. It is a house built entirely of tombstones, and stands on land which was formerly used as a cemetery. Its owner, who is also its occupier, purchased the land from the community and stipulated that he should have all there was on it. He had evidently an eye to the weather-beaten slabs that formerly marked the graves of the persons buried there. On taking possession, he collected the slabs, with which he has built his present dwelling. No attempt has been made at concealment. The stones have been set with their epitaph-faces to the front and the inscriptions on many of them are still legible. If the occupier is at all of a thoughtful character, he must be continually reminded every time he approaches his house of the folly of concentrating labor and ambition on this life, the memorials of which, though of stone, lose their identity with the possessor.

Their memorial is perished with them. (Psalm 9: 6.)

Marriage in High Air

The Government guard on the top of the Washington Monument at Washington, D. C., was surprised a few days ago by the arrival of a party of visitors at that eyrie among the clouds. Up there, more than five hundred feet above the surface of the earth, higher than any building in the world, these visitors had climbed to hold a wedding ceremony. The bride and bridegroom were Philadelphia people visiting in Washington, and, having arranged to be married, conceived the romantic idea of being married at that extraordinary elevation. The minister of a Baptist church in Washington consented to make the ascent with the party. On their arrival, the guard, perceiving that some unusual business had brought them, inquired its character, but saw no reason to object when it was disclosed. The ceremony was speedily performed, and the party, after staying a short time to admire the view, descended to the surface again. It was a strange place to choose for such a ceremony. We can but hope that their married life may at least have one characteristic of its beginning, in being high above the petty follies and scandals that spoil the peace and happiness of many unions.

Thou shalt keep them secretly in a pavilion from the strife of tongues. (Ps. 31: 20.)

Venezuela Defiant

Ordinary diplomatic measures having failed to obtain an amicable settlement of questions at issue between our Government and that of Venezuela, President Roosevelt last week submitted the whole matter to Congress. He is at the end of his constitutional resources, and cannot apply further pressure unless his powers are extended. He did not ask Congress to make any extension, but apparently relied on the necessity of such a measure for the vindication of the national honor being apparent. The documents sent to Congress show that there are five bases of grievance, the most important of which is the injustice done to the American Asphalt Company, on which a fine of five million dollars has been imposed. Other American interests have been fined, concessions made to them have been withdrawn on one pretext or another, they have been required to pay heavy taxes, and their plants have been seized. It has been useless to appeal to the Venezuelan courts, as the judges uniformly decide in accord with President Castro's contention. The aggrieved parties naturally appeal for protection to our Government, which, as the correspondence shows, has approached President Castro in a friendly spirit, trying to obtain justice, or at the least to have the disputes submitted to arbitration. We Invite Your Kind Co-operation

DEAR FRIENDS:—

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is again putting forth strenuous efforts to increase its subscription list and thus enlarge its sphere of service and usefulness. Without the co-operation of our present subscribers, who know what THE CHRISTIAN HERALD stands for, we cannot hope to succeed—with their kind assistance we can work wonders. Even as it is, we have accomplished great things. Our circulation is by far the largest among religious journals, but it should be much larger still. 216,000 a week is an enormous edition, but why should the best religious Family Weekly not aspire to the larger circulation attained by the best of the secular weeklies? One of the latter is now nearing the Million Mark. What a triumph it would be for the cause we represent if THE CHRISTIAN

HERALD could muster an Army of a Million Subscribers? And some day in the near future it will. Will you help us now to move forward? You know you will—for our subscribers never yet have failed us. Please your best and do it at once.

As an encouragement to you to put forth an immediate and special effort we have determined to make an unusual sacrifice for the benefit of every one who will help. The Books illustrated below are included in this sacrifice; are Subscriptions to the Magazines illustrated on the Opposite Page. American Magazine

Turned out by the most illustrious group of editorial workmen that has yet been assembled to make a magazine. Toiling together with heart and soul and mind, they write the best that can be written, and get from other pens the best that can be gotten—literature that lives and breathes and spurs to better living—illustrations that are true to life and nature. They are John S. Phillips, editor-in-chief, formerly of McClure's Magazine; Ida M. Tarbell, F. Dunne ("Mr. Dooley"), Ray Stannard Baker, Lincoln Steffens and William Allen White. Mr. Dooley will appear exclusively in every issue of The American Magazine of the current year—this is reason enough for adding it to your list.

Cosmopolitan

NO matter how many magazines you take, Cosmopolitan is the one you cannot afford to without. Its subscribers of last year are subscribers this year—with their friends. They'll be subscribers next year—with their friends' friends. This, after all, is the real test of a magazine's merit—that its readers tell their friends about it. You can be sure that in 1908 one feature in each issue will be of such universal interest as to dominate the magazine world for that month. As an example, take Cosmopolitan's great series of brilliant short stories by Oppenheim, or the remarkably popular "Wolfville Tales" of Alfred Henry Lewis. "The best—no matter what it costs," is the motto which makes Cosmopolitan resemble no other magazine but Cosmopolitan.

Good Housekeeping

GOOD HOUSEKEEPING is a richly illustrated magazine for all the family. It is, moreover, the most practical of the household magazines, and at the same time one of the brightest, most refreshing periodicals for general reading. It tells of how things should be done, but in a breezy way how they have been done by clever people. It is woman's best resource in the daily perplexities of home management, and is the court of ultimate appeal for things domestic. In a word, it is a cheery, helpful companion for the entire household, for it is the meeting ground of hundreds of practical, inspiring writers. It is issued monthly and reaches no less than a million readers. Whatever magazines you take, Good Housekeeping should be one of them.

Harper's Bazar

FOR forty-one years Harper's Bazar has been the leading American authority on fashion, good form, and entertainment. It will continue to be an invaluable household guide and assistant. Harper's Bazar is made for all refined American women. Such women are its most ardent admirers, whether their incomes are large or small, whether their scale of living is simple or complex, whether they dwell in towns or in the country. Harper's Bazar preaches economy—rational domestic economy—and wise spending. Harper's Bazar preaches simplicity—the simplicity of sane, wholesome, rational living. Harper's Bazar preaches progress—progress in the kitchen, in the nursery, and in every other home department.

McClure's Magazine

THE Magazine in a vast country like the United States—where the dimensions are those of a continent—has an influence almost unlimited. It reaches as many thinking people on the west coast as on the east, in the South as in the North. The Paris press controls France; the London press controls England; but only the magazine is big enough to reach all America—such a field is beyond the scope of the greatest daily ever published. McClure's Magazine was the first periodical to realize this great responsibility, and the first to make the monthly periodical a vital influence in good government and good citizenship—an instrument to help a great, wide-spread people understand itself and its possibilities.

Little Folks

A BEAUTIFULLY illustrated monthly magazine for young children. Mothers and fathers who wish to provide the very best reading and pictures for their young children, that will be read and re-read, and looked at and looked at, welcome Little Folks. It is a story-teller, a picture book, a playfellow, an out-of-school magazine. Its fun is of a simple, sunshiny sort. Its little tales of children possess an ethical value—they stimulate their readers and hearers to be fearless, cheerful, unselfish, and above all true and honorable. All stories of a painful kind are excluded, especially such as would haunt nervous and imaginative children. There is much curious and interesting natural history, also play-work for little fingers.

Pearson's Magazine

DESTRUCTIVE journalism has had its day. Fair-minded conservatism is now having its inning. For almost two years Pearson's has been consistently constructive in its editorial policies. Now there have come to be imitators; but Pearson's remains—the leader. In fiction, too, Pearson's has its distinctive quality. It is famous everywhere as the creator of Captain Kettle, Monsieur A. V., Don Q., Randolph Mason and Captain Romaine. A novelty feature in Pearson's Magazine is a light sociological study in verse, entitled "The Seven Stages of Unrest," by Carolyn Wells, exquisitely illustrated by Wallace Morgan—the creators of the famous "Fluffy Ruffles."

Success Magazine

THE investigation by Success Magazine of the opium curse in India, China and Japan, and of the responsibility of Great Britain and British traders for its extension against pitiful protests of the Chinese Government, who foresaw the inevitable demoralization of all classes of their people—forms the strongest, most important and most far-reaching work done by any American magazine for many years. Success has spent nearly $10,000 in making this investigation, sending Samuel Merwin—its special representative—for a six months' residence in the Orient for this purpose. The first of this series of articles appeared in Success for October, 1907. Also the beginning of "Lentala"—a new serial story of adventure—and the first of several articles on "The Real Thomas W. Lawson."

Woman's Home Companion

THE Woman's Home Companion gives to its readers each month as much good fiction as the story magazines, as much first-class art work as the picture magazines, more authoritative articles of interest to women than any other publication, and in addition a complete magazine of helpful departments, serving every practical need of the American woman. Dr. Edward Everett Hale retains his position at the head of the Companion's editorial staff. Mrs. Sangster, Jack London, Madame Nordica, Paderewski, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, whose greatest novel is just beginning in the magazine, and the author of "Eben Holden," are a few of the distinguished contributors to the Companion.

World To-Day (The)

THE only magazine of its class sold at a popular price. The World To-Day is a monthly world review, but is not made up of clippings of other publications. It obtains its information from original sources, and is reliable and up-to-date. Its contributors are the foremost men and women of the day. The reader will find in it recreation for the idle hour, and best of all—something worth while. Many illustrations are in colors. All other magazines of its class sell at $3. The World To-Day is but $1.50. Its remarkable quality and low price make it an exceptional bargain, and we recommend it strongly to our readers.

Notice! ONLY NEW SUBSCRIBERS, Not Now on our Books, and not intended to take the place of any on our Books, will be accepted under this offer. A change of name from One Member of the Family to Another DOES NOT constitute a NEW Subscription.

Are Ill-Assorted Marriages Preventable?

IN a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, a letter appeared from Mrs. A. S., a lady residing in New York State, in which the writer, discussing poverty and the condition of the slums, threw out the suggestion that one of the most effective remedies for poverty would be for the legislature to pass a law making it necessary for any man contemplating marriage to have at least $2,000 at interest, to be not less than twenty-five to thirty years old, and to be in a position to support a family. At the same time, the girl, the correspondent suggested, should be from twenty-three to twenty-five, and should "have things to keep house with." Such a law, she believed, would make a better people and go far toward wiping out the slums. The author of the suggestions also writes at greater length in explanation of her idea. Her latest communication will be found on the Editorial page. Many letters have been received from other readers commenting on these novel suggestions, some of which appear below:

What Our Readers Think of it

I fear your correspondent overlooks the fact that misfortune and adversity, for which the sufferer is in no way responsible, and against which he has fought with all the power of a determined will, have effectually schooled many thousands of our most worthy citizens in economy and morality, to an extent which is vastly more valuable to a human life than the $2,000 which your correspondent would make an unconditional qualification to that state which, we are told, is "honorable in all."

The remedy your correspondent seeks will be easily found in the members of her own sex. So long as there is such a rage among the American females to prefer a bogus, self-styled foreign count, lord, duke or other impostor; or even an unprincipled, perhaps dissipated man, of whom they may or may not know anything more than that he makes a grand show in society,—so long, I say, as the average lady prefers the attentions of any of these classes to the attentions of those of more moderate pretensions, who lead a straight-forward, consistent life—so long she must expect to find that she has been deceived, only to suffer the inevitable consequences of her lack of a proper consideration of cause and effect.

Watkins, N. Y.

Sound Home Training Needed

The New York lady has introduced a vital question, but her remedy is unworthy of consideration. Domestic conditions and conjugal relations are sorely in need of reform, but the absence of money is not the chief cause of existing evils. It isn't what we have that counts so much. It's the ability to get the greatest good out of what we do have.

Poverty is no crime. Our system (?) of home training is unpardonably abominable. Given a young couple with something worth while in their heads and hearts and they'll solve the financial problem—more than that: they will transmit the right qualities to their offspring.

But the greatest source of evil is the home training—or lack of it. There are thousands of sensible parents and sensibly reared boys and girls, and these constitute the backbone of society. While mother does the housework and father slaves to meet the bills, the girl is given an expensive course in music, learns to paint china, and lacerates the atmosphere in an elocutionary way, and just makes "lovely" fudge. Her wardrobe is ludicrously out of harmony with the family purse, and it is positively cruel to deny her a little travel.

It was really intended for her to marry well, you know, but the "wells" are in such popular demand and the market so bare that she marries a man of her own financial standing. Her father's purse and credit are strained almost to the breaking point, to provide an elegant trousseau, etc. A thousand-dollar wedding for a hundred-dollar couple! This sum of money sensibly handled would prove the foundation stone of their future prosperity.

Her husband is a fairly good man, industrious, and gets a moderate salary—enough to provide the necessities and lay by a little margin for investment. She never fried an egg nor made a biscuit. She does not know the first one of a thousand little economies that constitute the logical basis of prosperity. The little margin is swept away, and, too often, the future is drawn upon in the form of a loan.

The fault was with the parents. Train the girl to be a woman, a home-maker, a wife, a mother. Train the boy to be a man, a citizen, a husband, a father.

Hood River, Ore. A. J. MILLER.

High Rent and High Prices

Marriage has nothing much to do with the slums. In Grand Rapids, Mich., for instance, there are laws prohibiting high rent, high prices on market, and the city owns the electric lights, besides controlling the car service in just such a way that it is rare to see a cripple. People marry any time, and there are no paupers nor slums. On the other hand, in New York City there are no laws against high rent and high prices on light and market. It may be desirable that men be required to be economical in order to marry, but it is amusing to think the more money people save to marry on, the higher rent there would be to meet.

Dayton, O.

Such a Law Would be Folly

I can think of no good that could come from such a law as the New York lady suggests. What assurance is there that people would be better mated if they had a little money? Most of the people we read of getting divorces are those having more money than brains, and I am sure that love flying out the window when poverty and trial comes is the exception and not the rule.

Only evil could come from forcing people to wait for a certain age and condition before marrying. I began working for money at thirteen, forty-three years ago, married at the age of twenty-two, have never had the faculty of saving money or property. My father married twice, and each time was out of employment, but raised a large family.

Washington, D. C. C. M. D. BROME.

Things that are Better than Money

In my opinion, money before marriage is not always the best policy. Many couples have started their married life with nothing of this world's store, and are now the happy owners of comfortable homes and heads of loving families. I know a married couple who began with nothing but a second-hand stove, a small table and two chairs. They now have all the comforts one would wish.

The foundation of a family should be God and love. Study the Bible and live up to it, instead of enjoying Sunday excursions. Be present at the Sabbath service and mid-week prayer-meetings in place of attending social functions such as the theatres, dances and all others which tend toward the destruction of our happy homes. In doing this there would be less divorces and less slum life.

MRS. ROBT. PERRY.

New Hartford, N. Y.

Intemperance the Worst Evil

When we have a President and cabinet so fearless as to declare "intemperance shall be abolished once and forever," as the question of slavery was, then poverty and misery will be abolished.

I was one of a large family, coming from a home where education and temperance were the fundamental truths; although my parents had not a large income to maintain a home for nine children, neither poverty nor misery has visited the threshold.

No such a law as a bank account, large or small, nor any legislation placing a fixed age for a marriage—based upon love and respect—could successfully abolish poverty and misery.

Back to Nature and the Simple Life

I have read with interest your editorial entitled, "Ill-Assorted Marriages," and quite agree with what is said about the harm of ill-considered marriages. No doubt there are, too, cases in which people marry too young. But the tendency has been for many years to postpone the time of marriage until late in life, and at the same time divorces have been increasing about twice as fast as the population. Is this a mere coincidence?

There is no doubt that in the slums there are those who lack "consecrated common sense" as well as moral stability, and who have gotten into difficulty by marrying. But would not refraining from marriage have resulted in still worse evils? Almost any physician will tell you that attempting to live single is a cause of much of the social evil and attendant ills, so prevalent in this age. As for your correspondent's proposition to prohibit marriage until the age and financial condition she mentions are reached, we do not think it will work, for the simple but forcible reason that nature has prepared people for marriage at a much earlier age, and without respect to their bank account. Why should man attempt to thwart the laws which God has implanted in his being?

Would not the best solution of the problem be to carry the idea of "back to nature" into the family and learn to live the simple life? Many a man has lately learned that neither his "employment," nor "safe investment" was to be depended on, and that habits of thrift and frugality were his best assets.

Boulder, Colo.

W. J. REEKS.

Is the Remedy "a Dream?"

Marriage being a divine institution the best authority to consult for its wise regulation is God's Word. In it I fail to notice so much as a word, or even a hint, of a certain amount of this world's goods being required by God's law, or, for that matter, that any are needed at all, nor anything about the proper age of the contracting parties. That ought to satisfy a Christian.

I have myself known in Illinois a respectable couple of Swiss folks who had been obliged to emigrate to the United States in order to get married. The reason? They had no bank account. I myself, being in want of a certificate of origin, was gravely answered by letter that they were willing, but with the express reservation that said document should in no way be construed as a permission to get married!

I have no plan to propose for doing away with the slums. I would hate to take away from the already disinherited the only lawful, God-given bliss, the family joys, and reverse them all for the well-off one and for the rich. If those dreamers could be prevailed to read attentively I. Cor. 7—especially verse 9—they would see that the only way ordered by God to a man for resisting immorality is marriage.

LOUIS VORUZ.

Heppner, Ore.

It Would Make Marriage Mercenary

Times have never been so hard that a young couple with ordinary intelligence and health could not make a good living without having anything at interest. People do not become poor in the slums of our cities from marrying too young, or without means, but from bad habits, gambling and drinking. Furthermore, it does not seem right to put anything as sacred as marriage on a money basis. It would greatly reduce the number of marriages and make things worse.

Oxford, N. J.

READER.

The Cause of Poverty

I attribute much married misery to too expensive wedding outfits and wedding trips; setting up in a style too expensive, and wanting too many things; buying on the credit and instalment plan; too many luxuries; too much entertaining; no self-denial; trying to keep pace with wealthy people and going in debt for things they could do without; too much theatre going; expensive dress. Young people begin now in the same style their parents live and forget how many years it took to establish a home like their parents. The world is crazy on style and good eating. We need to go back to a simple life.

AN ANARCHIST BOMB IN NEW YORK

UNION SQUARE, in New York City, is usually as peaceful and orderly a spot as can be found in the turmoil of the metropolis. Broadway skirts it on one side, at the south is Fourteenth Street, at the east Fourth Avenue, and Seventeenth Street is at the north. Electric cars go bumping and clanging along these streets, while hurrying crowds of shoppers walk in never ending procession. In the park, in the centre of the square, there is usually nothing more aggressive than some sleepy looking loungers upon the benches along the walks about the fountain. For two brief hours, on the afternoon of Saturday, March 28, the square became the scene of disorder, culminating in an explosion and bloodshed that made those who saw it wonder if they were still in law-abiding America.

A call had been issued by the officials of several of the Socialist organizations for a meeting of "the unemployed" in Union Square. The labor unions investigated the reason for issuing the call and decided that organized labor should have nothing to do with the meeting. Under ordinary conditions the city government, when applied to for a permit to hold an open-air meeting, would have readily granted the request. This time, however, the Police Department, it is reported, had received intimations that trouble was to be expected from agitators which would probably result in riot. Accordingly, the permit was refused. The leaders of the meeting, nevertheless, went on with their plans.

On the afternoon of March 28 the square wore much its usual aspect, but the police were not deceived by this apparent calm. In groups of three and four they appeared and fell into platoons.

Inspector Schmittberger was watching events from the little rustic cottage at the north end. He had asked for 160 men—four from each of the Manhattan precincts—and it was these reinforcements that were now making their appearance in Union Square to report for duty.

Men soon began to gather in little groups on Fourth Avenue and on the walks in the park. As soon as a group showed an inclination to become stationary, the police would order it to move on. Suddenly the inspector in command was confronted by a man who cried out, "What are these police here for? Are you going to try to prevent us from meeting?"

"We are going to preserve order and stop any meeting held without a permit," replied the officer calmly. The man grew blustering and as the police escorted him to one side, men began to stream in from the side streets as if on a prearranged signal. In a few moments the square was packed with people. Few of the really unemployed seemed to be there. Most of those who came were well dressed and apparently were workers from the East Side. The inspector saw that he must act quickly if the crowd did not get beyond his control.

streets and went round and round the square. From the moving mass came the babel of many tongues, and the English that was spoken, except in a few cases, was of the badly broken variety. A prominent New York Socialist jumped on a stand to speak, but was forced down. The next moment he raised his voice shrilly and began to sing the French "Marseillaise." Hundreds of voices took it up. Through the sound of voices there came, however, the sound of galloping hoofs, and thirty-five mounted police swung into the square and forced the crowd into the side streets. The men receded sullenly. An orator on a box struck a mounted officer a blow in the face and was promptly pulled down by an officer on foot.

Despite the great provocation the police used their hands and not their clubs. At last the crowd thinned out and the officers assembled to march to their home station. Twenty-two tired officers were marching down one path on their way to the Mercer Street Station. At these the anarchists aimed their attack. A man with two companions was seen standing by the fountain and handling what looked like a very light-colored grape-fruit. He raised it and the next moment people were staggering and falling from the shock of an explosion. The bomb, however, had exploded prematurely, desperately wounding the bomb-thrower and instantly killing one of his companions, and the wildest excitement followed. Two of the police were slightly wounded. The police at once arrested all in the park. The wounds of the assassin were dressed by ambulance surgeons and he was taken to a hospital. He said his name was Silverstein, but it was found to be Selig Cohen. It was found that he belonged to the Anarchist Association and to the section of "reds" that manufacture bombs and use them when opportunity offers.

His relatives said he talked of bomb-making constantly and that he was a tailor and not out of work. Prominent agitators in the city were placed under arrest, as it was found from papers in Selig's room that further outrages might be expected.

Police Surgeons Beside the Wounded Bomb Thrower

"Keep them all moving!" he commanded. There were then about 6,000 people packed upon the sidewalks and only 250 policemen. The police got them on the march, but they refused to move off down the side

THE SPECTRE OF FAMINE IN INDIA

CROP prospects in India continue to be a subject of intense interest to the missionaries, and there are still apprehensions of much suffering. As early as November, the reports from mission stations within the famine area were full of forebodings. At Allahabad the famine had already begun throughout a large district. At Fatehpur, the price of grain had risen to the highest point reached in the great famines of 1897 and 1900. The government had given orders for thousands of wells to be dug. The Allahabad Pioneer declared the outlook in the United Provinces and Eastern Punjab as "very gloomy." Prices were rising everywhere. Plague, too, began its deadly work in many parts of the United Provinces. Before the beginning of the new year the existence of a famine was universally acknowledged. A large section of the country was in its grasp, and the government was making tremendous efforts at relief; but it was heart-sickening for the missionaries to note the utter inadequacy of these measures. Even the farmers were trying to buy grain. There was no grain in any of the villages. All the ominous signs of the last two famines were repeated. Bengal, with its scant crops, could give no help. The eyes of the missionaries were again turned toward America, whence aid had come in previous famines.

By the middle of February, over 50,000 persons were engaged on the relief works in the Allahabad district alone. Over 600,000 were on relief works throughout the United Provinces. The men get three cents, women two cents and the children one cent per day. The Famine Committee of the province had voted 20,000 rupees for blankets. Many of the people on the works were almost naked. At Fatehpur it was estimated that one-half the local population, or over 225,000, would soon be dependent on charity.

Questions and Answers

W. F. G. Murfreesboro, N. C. What is the meaning of the Irish sentence, "Erin go bragh?"

It means, we believe, "Ireland forever."

X. F., Berwick, Pa. Will God forgive a man his sin if he does not repent and seek forgiveness, if another prays for him? The question is suggested by Christ's prayer for the soldiers (Luke 23: 34).

The fact that Christ did pray for them implies that he believed that there was efficacy in the prayer. All intercessory prayer is founded on the hope that it will be heard. A mother prays that the sin of her wayward son may be forgiven. The Christian is bidden to pray for his enemies. The thought may have crossed Christ's mind that such cruelty as the soldiers were guilty of was unpardonable. It was significant of his love to put in a plea for them and there is a tradition that those men were among the Pentecostal converts and were really forgiven.

L. C. F., Hazel, S. Dak. 1. Please give the names of the twelve apostles. 2. What is meant by the "centre of population"?

1. See Matthew 10: 2-4. 2. In 1900, when the last computation was made, the centre of population was six miles southeast of Columbus, Ind. It does not mean the geographical centre, but the point around which the population of the entire country is about equally distributed.

B. O. H., Dorchester, N. B. 1. What was the significance of the baptism of repentance administered by John the Baptist? 2. Was it Christian baptism? 3. Had he seen Jesus before he presented himself for baptism? 4. Had John been authorized or commanded to baptize?

1. It was significant in that it stirred the nation and was a preparation for the coming Messiah. "I am a voice," John said, "crying, prepare ye the way of the Lord." 2. How could it be, when it preceded the work of Christ? 3. There is no record of a meeting, though it is not improbable, seeing that they were cousins. John said he did not know Christ (John 1: 33), but that may have meant he did not know him as the Messiah. 4. Most distinctly (see John 1: 33). John said explicitly, "He that sent me to baptize with water."

J. E. W., Ringwood, N. C. Where is Bruton Church to which the King of England sent the Bible last summer?

Bruton Church is in Williamsburg, Va.

A. L., Sanborn, N. D. Does what is said in Gen. 1: 27 and 2: 7 refer to the same creation, or does it mean that two males and females were created?

Both passages refer to the last stage in the process of creation—the creation of man—the second passage adding the significant words that man became "a living soul," being the first intimation of man's immortality.

R. McA., Detroit, Mich. What is the numerical strength of the Protestant missionary force throughout the world at the present time?

Dr. D. L. Leonard, an acknowledged authority, has compiled these figures from the annual reports. They show a gratifying increase over previous years.

	Ordained Missionaries	Total Force in the field	Communicants
Totals for 1906	5,937	108,264	1,843,309
Totals for 1905	5,905	107,174	1,754,182
Totals for 1900	4,738	78,585	1,369,425

L. H., Ridgetown, Ont. Who is the head or chief of the Church of England?

Nominally, the King. He has, however, little to do with the control of it. The Bishops and Archbishops are nominally appointed by him, but really by the Premier, though doubtless his wishes, if he expressed them, would be respected. The Bishops have control of the clergy, but an appeal lies from them to the Privy Council, a body of clerical and lay peers and gentlemen appointed by the King.

T. M. K., St. Paul, Kan. How many times in the Bible does God command that the Sabbath be kept holy?

It would be an interesting exercise, for any one who has time, to count the number of times. It is sufficient for the Christian to know that he has commanded it once.

S. L. B. Can you give me some information about Pocahontas?

She was born about 1595, and died in 1617. She was the daughter of King Powhatan, a Virginian chief. After the settlement of Jamestown she frequently visited the place. In 1612 she was taken prisoner by the whites, and the next year became a Christian. In April, 1614, she married John Rolfe. In 1616 she went with her husband to England. See Fiske's Old Virginia and Her Neighbors.

Mrs. J. S., Washington, Ill. Have we greater miracles to-day than in the days when sorcerers flourished? Where did sorcery originate?

Sorcery or divination is practically as old as the human race. It may have originated in Arabia, India or Egypt. From general, Pakenham, was killed and his army lost 2,600 men. The Americans lost 8 killed and 13 wounded. Write to the secretaries of the boards of health of the cities you mention for the information asked for in your other question.

L. D. W., Hammondsport, N. Y. If the government can prevent the adulteration of foods, why can it not prevent the adulteration of liquors? I have heard it said by good authority that there was not one drop of wine or brandy made in this country that was not adulterated, and that beer is the most vile of all drinks.

What you have heard is probably true, but it only makes matters worse. The whole traffic is bad—so bad that it should be abolished. Strong drink is the source of more misery, suffering, privation, crime, disease and untimely deaths, than any other evil in the world to-day. It is the cause of many needless burdens in the form of taxation to support jails, judges, the higher Michigan courts have done like wise. Write to the Secretary, Federation of Sunday Rest Associations, Milwaukee Wis., for all details.

E. O. White, Toronto, Can., kindly send the following in regard to a recent query of L. L., Holland, Mich.: "Why is holly used at Christmas time?"

The Druids made mistletoe with its bright white berries a symbol in their heathenish worship. The Christian missionaries appropriated the holly as a symbol to instruct the people in Gospel truths. 1. The evergreen leaves were an object-lesson of God's everlasting love. 2. The beautiful glossy brightness of the leaves set forth the loveliness of Christ's character. 3. The prickles symbolize the nails in the Saviour's hands and feet and the sharp thorns upon his brow when on Calvary's cross. 4. The red berries symbolize the drops of blood shed by the Saviour for the sins of the world. At Christmas, the great Christian holy day, the churches were freely decorated with holly, but the mistletoe was never allowed a place in the Christian sanctuary.

W. F. J., Otselic, N. Y. Which is the correct expression, a "tenement house" or a "tenant house," when applied to a house occupied by a tenant and for one family only?

A "tenant house" is correct. At the same time, the term is seldom used, except probably in rural districts. The term "tenement house" applies to the poorer class of dwellings, which are divided into different apartments for each family.

Miss M. M. R., Camp Nelson, Ky. 1. How old was Fanny Crosby when she became blind? 2. What caused her blindness? 3. Where was she born? 4. Is Ira D. Sankey still living?

1. She became blind when she was a mere infant. 2. The cause was the application of hot poultices to her eyes during an illness, destroying the optic nerve. 3. Born in Southeast, Putnam County, N. Y., March 24, 1820. She now lives in Bridgeport, Conn. 4. Yes, Mr. Sankey is still living, though blind and in retirement.

E. J. S., Rome, N. Y. What is the meaning of "Harp of the North" in the prelude to Scott's poem, "Lady of the Lake"?

It refers to the spirit of ancient Gaelic minstrelsy, which for many ages had found its best and highest expression in the harp. The harpers or minstrels were once familiar figures, but they have long since disappeared. They sang of great deeds, of wars and single combats, of patriotism, and of notable acts of love, piety and consecration.

Easter Monday Egg-Rolling on the White House Grounds, Washington, D. C.

the earliest days there have been seers, necromancers, fortune-tellers, astrologers and magicians, who, by playing on the credulity of the people, pretended to direct events and read the future. They could do this better in those earlier days than now, on account of the widespread superstition and ignorance. The Bible repeatedly warns us against trusting sorcerers or patronizing them. They pretended to produce storms, raise spirits, communicate with the dead and bring about death, good or evil fortune, marriage, etc. The world to-day, being more enlightened, punishes such impostors in almost every civilized country.

"OVER THERE" AN EASTER MESSAGE

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

IT was a rather long ferry, and the boat forged steadily onward against the tide. On the forward deck close to the chain stood a lady in deepest mourning, carrying in her hands a splendid sheaf of American Beauty roses. Their glorious color and sweet perfume, their long stems reaching nearly to the hem of her dress, and their lavish number made her a conspicuous object to her fellow passengers. "My! they must have cost a fortune!" exclaimed a thinly clad young girl who stood a little distance off, admiring the magnificent bloom, and secretly wishing that she had only one such rose to carry with her to the bedside of a sick mother. The hopeless dejection in the lady's face touched all who saw her with swift sympathy, for she looked as if she had lost everything she cared for, and as if she could never be comforted again. The contrast between her pallid countenance and the superb flowers in her arms was not more marked than that between her and a workingman who stood a little way off in shabby, almost threadbare garments, wearing something of the same look of absorption that was evident in the brooding face of the lady.

He, too, had his tribute of flowers, beautiful Bermuda lilies that he carried in a large tin pail filled with water. Yet the man's look was that of one who had somehow passed through sorrow and come out on its other side, having gained the victory through faith, while the woman's was that of one who as yet had seen no stars shining through her cypresses.

The wind blew fresh and chill, although it was an April day, and just before Easter. The lady drew her wrap a little closer and shivered. The boat was approaching the dock. The man stepped to the lady's side and, lifting his cap, said gently, "Pardon me, madam, for intruding, but I see we are going to the same place, to the cemetery, with our flowers. Mine were brought me by a sailor friend. I am too poor to buy them. Yours have cost much gold, but we both know the meaning of loss and pain, and I hope we both know the message of the flowers: they mean that there is life beyond, and that we shall see them, the dear ones, safe at home by and by."

The lady thanked him, and they stepped from the boat to the pavement. A carriage was in waiting for her, but the man walked. Presently she stopped the carriage and waited for him, inviting him to a seat by her side. Abruptly she spoke. "You believe that we shall find our lost ones again?"

"Yes," he said, simply, "I believe every word that Jesus ever said, and he said, 'In my Father's house are many mansions.' My little Mildred is waiting for me over there. She is just as much mine as her sister at home, only one is pale and suffering and cannot sleep at night and may never walk again, while the other is full of health and strength and beauty in the homeland."

"Ten weeks ago," the lady replied, "I was the mother of an only son. He was everything that a mother's heart could wish, an athlete in body and mind. He filled my life with pride and joy. He was taken mysteriously ill, and in three days he was gone. My husband is dead, and I have no other child. I cannot see an inch beyond the grave where they laid him. I cannot think of my Harold sitting still with a golden harp, and resting forever. He was not tired, he did not need rest, he had life before him, and death snatched him away."

"Yes," answered the new friend, as the horses walked slowly up the hill and then passed through the cemetery gate into the beautiful God's-acre where so many sleepers lay peacefully beneath the grass and flowers. "Yes, I can understand, but don't you know the word in Revelation where it says that his servants shall serve him? I can't think of my Mildred as sitting still and singing. She was one that flitted about like a butterfly in the sun, and she loved to wait upon others. I think the dear Lord has set her some task over there that her little hands can do, and he has found a place for your boy. I did not bring all my

She sent other flowers to a hospital in which there were many crippled children, and the nurses told her a day or two later that she would have been more than repaid had she seen the eager clutch of tiny claw-like hands, and the light on little wizened faces when a flower was laid beside every pillow. Her regret was that she had not asked her fellow passenger his name. She would have been glad to have helped the daughter whom he had mentioned as an invalid in his home. He had said his word in season,

"Presently she stopped the carriage and waited for him" lilies for Mildred. I have saved some to make Easter Sunday happier for Sophy, and I think that is what Mildred would like. Good-by, dear lady, and may God bless you."

They went on their separate ways, and on the return journey they did not meet, but the man's faith had kindled a little warmth in the woman's heart, and the ice therein began to melt. She left her roses on the mound that covered her boy and hid him from her sight. But that evening she went to a Settlement in which he had been interested, and although the young men there were mostly Hebrews, to whom Easter in its Christian significance was a mockery, she bore to them a gift, not merely of fragrant flowers, but of sweet womanly love. She said to the leader of the group with whom Harold had often met, "I want to do something for these boys for Harold's sake, to keep his memory green. You must tell me what to do."

and apparently passed altogether out of her sight. This is a little world, however, and in it unlikely things are always happening.

The Easter music in its triumphant cadences had floated up to join the angels' song, the Easter flowers had faded and summer had come. Long rows of great houses on stately New York avenues were closed for the summer, and those who lingered latest were preparing to depart to the seashore or the mountains. Harold's mother had lingered long, but she was going at last, and the express company were taking to the station her trunks and boxes. Stepping out to pay the expressman who had placed her trunks in the wagon, she was struck by something familiar, and suddenly recalled her friend of Passion week. She took his hand and looked into his eyes, her own filling with tears, not wholly sorrowful. "Oh, I am glad to see you!" she said. "You opened the door for me, although you did not know it, into a new world, a world of courage and of good cheer. What you said that day led me to study my Bible, and now I believe that heaven is a reality. I can wait for it. Tell me where you live. I want to get acquainted with your little Sophy and her mother."

Something like a falling curtain for an instant obscured the steady courage and quiet serenity of the man's strong face. "It will be so good in you," he said. "Sophy has a lonely time of it, poor child. Her mother has been insane for three years." Then the curtain seemed to rise. "It is the will of God," he said. "God knows what is right."

The lady deferred her journey for a day that she might visit the little flat which was the home of her friend, the expressman, where his daughter Sophy sat by the window most of the day. The neighbors were kind and the father was accustomed to doing much woman's work, so that the little flat had a home-like aspect. The first visit was one of many continued after the summer had gone, and a skilled physician was found who was able greatly to benefit the invalid girl. So the blessing of Easter made a long path of brightness in the little home as in the large one.

One never knows on what errand he may be sent between sunrise and sunset. One never knows what messenger is coming from the King with a command, a greeting or a bit of consolation. God's angels come to us sometimes as unseen visitants, breathing into our ears thoughts that vibrate with the melody of heaven. But all the angels do not stand around the throne of God. An angel is a messenger, and the woman who works in your kitchen, the man who tills your fields, the minister who preaches to you from the pulpit and the friend who writes you a timely letter may do angels' work and bring you angelic cheer. Chief among God's angels dwelling here, or winging their flight to us from over there, are those who teach us to believe that the Lord is risen indeed.

The Child-Labor Evil

"IN spite of the gains made during the last decade," said George A. Hall, secretary of the New York Child Labor Committee, in an address at the annual meeting of the Federation of Churches and Christian Organizations in New York City, "there are to-day one and three-quarter million of children under sixteen years of age employed in various occupations. Twenty-five per cent. of the wage earners in the United States are under sixteen years of age, and of this percentage the proportion of girls increases terribly. While laws prohibiting the employment of children in factories and stores have been enacted and are daily being better enforced, the home-workers still remain untouched by law. The child-labor problem is universal throughout all parts of our land. Georgia has children working in its mills; in Pennsylvania are boys of tender years toiling daily in the darkness of the mines; the glass-works of New Jersey and West Virginia employ children; Massachusetts and New York present the horrors of sweat-shop labor for the youngest children, while department stores, factories, canneries and the various street trades offer employment for thousands. We are hoping," said Mr. Hall, "that the present legislature may enact some statute, vote some legislation for the further protection of children. Christianity cannot pass by the child."

After a study has been made of the following words in Esperanto, it will be possible to read and understand the Esperanto rendering of the 23d Psalm.

La Dudek-tria Psalm

- 1 La Sinjoro estas mia paŝtisto; mi nenion bezonas.
- 2 Li min kuŝigas en verdaj herbejoj; li min kondukas apud la akvo trankvila.
- 3 Li resanigas mian animon: li min kondukas sur la vojoj de justeco pro sia nomo.
- 4 Vere, kvankam mi pasus tra la valo de l'ombro de la morto, mi timus nenian malbonon: ĉar vi ĉeestas ĉe mi; via vergo kaj via bastono ili min konsolas.
- 5 Vi pretigas antaŭ mi regalon meze de miaj malamikoj; vi sanktoleas mian kapon: mia kaliko superfluigas.
- 6 Nepre boneco kaj kompateco sekvados al mi ĉiujn tagojn de mia vivo: kaj mi restados ĉe la Sinjoro eterne.

Note from Mr. Charles W. Stewart, who translated this Psalm: This pastoral Psalm is translated from the English. Its metaphors might be a little more closely connected with sheep and shepherds, but it is in substantial agreement with the original Greek of the Septuagint, and agrees well with the English.

A Word-Study of the Psalm

Why does dudek-tria end in a? What is the significance of ist in paŝtisto? Why do nenion and nenian end in n? Why bezonas in os? What does ig mean in kuŝigas, pretigas and resanigas, and ig in superfluigas? Why do verdaj, herbejoj, vojoj end in j? Why does kondukas end in as? Why is ec in justeco, kompateco and boneco? (ec denotes abstract qualities: justa, just; justeco, righteousness; kompati, to take compassion; kompateco, mercy.) Why do pasus and timus end in us? Why do sekvados and restados end in os? Why do ĉiujn and tagojn end in n? Explain mal in malbona. Explain mal in malamikoj. (These questions can easily be answered if the ways for forming new words by prefixes and suffixes are reviewed.)

What the Leader of the Circle Can Do

Ask the above questions of the members of the Circle. Request that the Psalm be written on the blackboard, each member in the Circle writing a word in turn. If a blackboard is not convenient, let the leader write the first word on a sheet of paper, and pass the paper along, each member writing the next word in turn.

What All Members Should Do

They should memorize the twenty-third Psalm in its Esperanto form.

The Lord's Prayer in Esperanto

The following is the Lord's Prayer in Esperanto, and is printed at the request of an old subscriber who is studying Esperanto at the age of eighty:

Patro Nia

Patro nia, kiu estas en la ĉielo, sankta estu Via nomo, venu reĝeco Via, estu volo Via, kiel en la ĉielo, tiel ankaŭ sur la tero. Panon nian ĉiutagan donu al ni hodiaŭ, kaj pardonu al ni ŝuldojn niajn, kiel ni ankaŭ pardonas al niaj ŝuldantoj; ne konduku nin en tenton; sed liberigu nin de la malvera, ĉar Via estas la regado, la forto, kaj la gloro eterne. Amen!

ASTRONOMICAL QUERIES

ANSWERED BY PROF. S. P. LELAND, PH.D., LL.D., SEABREEZE, FLA.

G. W. E. Xenia, O. Why is it that the aurora borealis is not seen of late years?

The aurora borealis is of magnetic origin. It is closely connected with the sun. Our planet and its atmosphere are alive with magnetic currents. These forces and the laws governing them we do not clearly understand. We know that the number and brilliancy of these displays are dependent largely on the condition of the sun, and to some extent on the size and number of sun spots. When any great disturbance occurs upon our great luminary, auroras will stream over the skies of our earth and its fellow planets. The magnetic needles will vibrate, and frequently the electric currents of the telegraph wires will intermit. And as the conditions of the sun are variable, so is the frequency or otherwise of the auroras.

Mrs. W. B. A., Biddeford, Me. Saturn and Mars are near each other in the southwest and visible at dark. Early in January they were near each other. They are moving eastward among the stars. The movement of Mars is more rapid, so they are gradually becoming separated. Venus is the bright star in the southwest in early evening. Jupiter rises in the east about the time that Venus goes down. They are both very brilliant and beautiful. Venus is approaching the earth and becoming brighter. Two of the moons of Jupiter can be easily seen with a common field-glass. Saturn's rings are now nearly edgewise to the earth, and can only be seen by a glass three or four inches, well mounted. Mercury is visible in the west, following the sun at his setting. Uranus is near the sun and will be visible in late February. Neptune rises in the early evening and remains visible all night. Our heavens are exceptionally beautiful now. These were the positions on January 17. Once located, it is easy to follow them through the year.

L. B. B. Napoleon, Mich. The orbit of the moon is not situated in the ecliptic; that is, it does not move around the sun on the same plane that the earth does. The plane on which the moon moves, is inclined 5 degrees to the plane on which the earth moves. In winter, the full moon is as high in the sky as the sun is in summer, and sometimes even higher, but in the summer it is very low. At the midwinter solstice, the moon in our latitude rises to an altitude of 70 degrees. This accounts for the apparent movements of the moon. It is a popular notion that the changes of the moon and its position affect the weather, but scientific men have no confidence in the claim. Tables have been made from observations, stretching over long periods of time, which clearly prove that the moon's phases have no influence on our weather.

M. V. B. P., Salem, Mass. Regarding the Star of Bethlehem, the explanation given in the clipping is one of many, and is largely fanciful. Astronomers do not attempt to explain that phenomenon on any scientific basis. The conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn could produce no such result, even though Mars had crossed the path of both at the same time. As early as 1572, Tycho Brahe described a star which appeared suddenly one night, with a brightness exceeding that of Sirius, Lyra or Jupiter. Its appearance was believed by the superstitious to portend the end of the world. Its light, however, faded, and in a few months disappeared. The history of astronomy affords many such instances. The explanation of the appearance and conduct of the Star of Bethlehem must be sought elsewhere than in astronomy.

E. H. B., Pomona, Fla. The length of a lunar month—that is, the time of the revolution of the moon around the earth—is substantially twenty-nine days and twelve hours. Any year except a leap year, when a full moon occurs on January 31, the next full moon will be on March 1, leaving February without a full moon. This is not an infrequent occurrence.

Easter at the Bowery Mission

AN Easter morning special service will be held at the Bowery Mission.

This is always regarded as one of the great days at the Mission, second only to Christmas or Thanksgiving. This year Easter cantata by Tullar and Meredith, the singing evangelists, has been practised by the men themselves and they have shown great interest in the preparations. Members of the Brotherhood have done most of the work; but the men in the audience have helped with the choruses. At first those in charge could not understand why the chorus was not more effective, but they soon realized that it was because almost every night the chorus consisted of different men.

Easter marks the closing of the Bread Line. Conditions among the unemployed have been unusually severe this winter, and although the amount of food distributed was doubled not long ago, and the cost increased in proportion, yet many have remained unfed. As spring approaches, however, the exodus of men to the country begins and the suffering diminishes. Not all the "wanderers" in New York leave it for the summer months, however. There would still be enough to form a Bread Line if it were practicable to keep this part of the work going the year round.

Despite the unfortunate business conditions, the lack of employment, failures and shut-downs, the workers at the Mission feel that this has been their best year. Employment has been found for many, although the difficulties have been increased by such incidents as the following: After one of the Thursday evening meetings a man came up to Mother Bird and told her he had just arrived from San Francisco and must have work.

"Why did you come to New York?" she exclaimed, "where so many are out of work?"

"San Francisco is worse," he replied. "There are thousands of men out there, and everything is so bad there's no chance at all. I left my wife and child with friends, so they'll be all right; but I've got to get work."

He was a clean-looking, honest fellow—the kind that does get something because he is determined to succeed.

A most encouraging feature of the work is that many of the men have managed to "hold on" in spite of temptations. This result is largely due to the spiritual work of the Brotherhood, which includes a number of men who were converted at the Mission. They hold special meetings before each service and help each other, and after the regular meetings they assist with the general work among the men. These "brothers" have been a great help to Superintendent Hallimond.

The Easter-time is filled with the idea of resurrection—the springing into new life—of bud, leaf, bird, creature. To the struggling men of the Bowery Mission it means new spiritual strength and life to each, and a power that helps them to rise above the world and its allurements and disappointments, and to learn something of a higher and nobler life. Doubtless many of the poor fellows who have wandered into the Bowery Mission this past winter, possibly only to warm themselves or to satisfy their hunger, have been encouraged to begin a new life with the returning springtime.

It is hoped that the new building will be ready for occupancy by the fall. Meanwhile, services are to be held every night in the old familiar place. E. H.

Christening in the Spreewald

YOUR recent article in regard to the Spreewald was especially attractive to me. I was in that part of Germany in 1905, and found the people here most interesting, and brought home many pictures of them and of the scenes here. I had none, however, of this funeral scene which was given in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

I went to a church service there on the Sabbath. The first held in the morning was in German (I did not attend that); then the congregation was dismissed, and one for the Wends gathered immediately. It was a short service and included a christening. The pastor preached in two languages. When the child was brought in for baptism there were, besides the lady who carried it, eight other persons who walked up to the front with it—four men and four women. The men there never wear a beard. The women have a special suit which they wear at christenings: the usual short, full skirt and short-sleeved waist, and on their heads, in place of a bonnet, is a large framework of rattan, bent so as to fit on the head, and from each side is a projection of rattan, so that when the large, white handkerchief (some of them nearly two yards square) is spread over it, it stands out like two huge wings. These handkerchiefs are bordered with a fringe. The special christening additions are a deep, stiff Elizabethan ruff around the neck, which comes out to the edge of the shoulders, a wide, white, satin ribbon coming to the bottom of the dress and tied in front. Each woman carries in her hand, as she walks up to the font, the book of Psalms or hymns, which has printed in gold, on the outside cover, the words: "Ein feste Burg." On this cover is folded a white handkerchief, and on that rests a little nosegay. The whole party presents a most unusual appearance, as it groups around the font. The blanket covering the baby is of purple satin, bordered with white lace.

After the service was over, the party, with other relatives, went into a house near by and had a christening dinner. As I had my dinner in the same place, I saw the table spread and the repast laid on it, which consisted of loaves of bread laid up and down the table (not cut) on the snow-white cloth, and different kinds and colors of bologna sausage, sliced up and laid on plates. One kind was white, and I was told it was veal. The baby was brought into the room where I was sitting and placed on a billiard table. As it made no sound during the long service at the church, nor all the time while they were eating their dinner, I ventured to turn away the blanket and look at its face, to see if it could be really alive. Its little eyes were tightly closed, and it was evidently in a deep sleep. I wondered if they might not have some kind of "soothing syrup" there, in the Spreewald, to keep children quiet.

They are altogether a most peculiar, interesting people. Mrs. L. J. Pruscott

6,000 Converts at Decatur, Ill.

A remarkable revival has just closed in Decatur, Ill., after five weeks' meetings under the leadership of Rev. W. A. Sunday. Twelve Protestant churches united and built a tabernacle seating 6,000 people. The expenses were almost $7,000, which was raised during the first two weeks of the meetings. A choir of 500 voices was organized under the leadership of Mr. Fisher. Six thousand one hundred and thirty-five converts are claimed, and many church members rededicated their lives to God's work.

For almost three weeks Evangelist Sunday directed his efforts toward the church members and afterward to the unsaved. The tabernacle was packed to the utmost every night and many had to be turned away. Many would go as early as five o'clock to get in line for a seat. As a "thank-offering," the people of Decatur and vicinity gave Rev. Mr. Sunday $12,000.

Joy in Christlike Service

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

NOW before the feast of the Pass-over. It was Thursday evening, April 16, A.D. 30, the celebration of the birthday of the Jewish nation, commemorating their exodus from Egypt, to go to the Promised Land. Jesus and his twelve apostles were gathered in an upper room to eat the Pass-over. This room is shown to travelers to-day. It is a large chamber thirty feet wide by about fifty feet long and is located over the so-called tomb of David. But it is more likely that it was a much smaller room in the house of Mary, the mother of John Mark, a home which afterwards became a rallying place for Christians that they might pray together, as they did for Peter in prison. That home has entirely disappeared. The room, wherever it was, had been selected by Peter and John, under the direction of Jesus (Luke 22: 7-12).

The Foot-Washing

"Jesus knew that his hour was come that he should depart out of this world." He was already within the shadow of the cross, but those who had been intimately associated with him for three years were not aware of it. And yet he loved them and would love them to the end. "And the supper being ended." The Revised Version puts it, "And during the supper." It was the Paschal Supper, at ter that he poureth water into a basin, and began to wash the disciples' feet and to wipe them with the towel wherewith he was girded." Jesus would teach them the dignity of service as against the selfishness of prestige. It was a new way to get a first place.

The Modern Ceremony

During Holy Week in Rome there is a travesty of this incident, when the Pope washes the feet of twelve aged paupers. It is done in the presence of people of the highest social and political rank. The twelve old men representing the Apostles are seated in a row in a chapel, and the Pope sprinkles a few drops of water on the right foot of each one, then wipes it, and kisses it. After this ceremony, a feast is served by the Pope and his assistants, and at the close, the twelve paupers are permitted to take away with them the white cloths which were placed upon them for the occasion and the towels with which their feet had been wiped, and each one is, also, given a piece of money.

A similar ceremony is performed annually in Austria, when the Emperor represents Christ. This act does not represent humility so much as service. Following the example of Christ in this act implies doing real service for others, with noble disregard day by day, not which roast lamb and bitter herbs and unleavened bread were eaten, and wine was drunk. There were the first, second, third and fourth cups, each about half a tumbler full, largely mixed with water. Each cup was taken ceremonially in its order. After the first cup had been passed around, it was customary for the head of the company to rise and "wash hands." And it was at that juncture that Jesus did the foot-washing. There had been no servant to wash the feet of the apostles, and they had been too proud to do it for each other, or too much occupied with the thought of getting the best places at the table, to attend to it. And so they had come to the feast with unwashed feet, an unusual proceeding in an Oriental company wearing only sandals on their feet.

Self-Abasement

"He riseth from supper, and laid aside his garments and took a towel and girded himself." A recent traveler in Palestine says: "A slave in my bedroom washed my feet. I was struck by the degree of abasement in the act; and as he held my foot in the towel, with his head bowed down toward it, I remembered the condescension of the blessed Lord." "After that he poureth water into a basin, and began to wash the disciples' feet and to wipe them with the towel wherewith he was girded." Jesus would teach them the dignity of service as against the selfishness of prestige. It was a new way to get a first place.

Peter's Erring Judgment

"Peter saith unto him, Thou shalt never wash my feet." Peter's instincts were right, but his judgment was wrong, as the reply of Jesus shows. "If I wash thee not thou hast no part with me." Jesus meant that Peter could have no fellowship with him if he did not learn the lesson of loving service. "What can I do for you?" was the greeting with which a popular minister was accustomed to meet people. He had learned the joy of service. Ruskin said: "The grandest men in the world have chosen to be the world's servants rather than the world's masters." When we are workers together with God, then helpfulness is holiness.

"Simon Peter saith unto him, Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head." Peter's desire was to be entirely consecrated, but for all that, he was in those days as unstable as water!

A Certain Man,"

says the Delineator, "young, apparently in vigorous health, earning an excellent salary, was the sole support of an aged mother, wife and child. Being a generous, good-hearted, care-free fellow, he lived up to every cent of his income, never thought of life insurance, and one day, after a brief illness, died. He was a man of intelligence, and must have noted the distress into which families of other men were plunged when the husband and father was taken away suddenly, leaving no provision for the future for the helpless ones who could not provide for themselves. But probably he thought he had many years before him to prepare for such emergencies—there are thousands of men like him."

No one knew it so well as Jesus, for a few hours ahead was the denial of his Lord by Peter. But how grandly his life afterward proved that he did belong to Christ, feet, hands and head! Let us encourage ourselves in Peter.

"Know ye what I have done unto you?" Christ would bring to his apostles "the arrest of thought." The cleansing of their feet was a mere instance, while the question of loving service was the whole matter. "I have given you an example that ye should do as I have done to you."

The Discordant Note

The discordant note of that supper was that the devil had put it into the heart of Judas Iscariot to betray him. "The deed was virtually done," says Edersheim, and Jesus, longing for the quiet fellowship of his own, with all that was to follow, bade him do quickly what he had in mind. Judas went out into the dark night, and the Paschal Supper proceeded, and with the third cup, called "the cup of blessing," began the institution of the Lord's Supper. The breaking of the unleavened cake became the breaking of the bread of the Holy Eucharist. The truth which the lesson teaches is that to serve and help others is Christlike, and into this thought the Golden Text fits: "Love one another even as I have loved you."

What is it like in the Bible? King David was in battle array against the Philistines, whose garrison was in Bethlehem. He was overcome with thirst, and longed for water and said: "Oh that one would give me to drink of the well of Bethlehem, which is by the gate." He had remembered the taste of that sweet water from his boyhood days. Was there any one among his soldiers willing to perform the loving, loyal service of getting the water, even at the risk of his own life? Yes, three mighty men broke through the host of the Philistines, and drew water out of the well of Bethlehem, and brought it to David. But it is said: "Nevertheless he would not drink thereof, but poured it out before the Lord" as a sacrifice, saying, "Is not this the blood of the men that went in jeopardy for their lives?" (II. Sam. 23: 12-17.)

A Consecrated Life

What is it like in daily life? "The Bishop of Uganda was at one time a young artist. He was engaged in painting a picture which he hoped would find a place in the Academy. It was the figure of a lovely woman struggling up a street in a wild, stormy night, the sleet driven by the wind into her face, a little baby at her bosom. And doors and windows were shut in her face. The picture was called "Homeless." As the man painted it and the artist's imagination filled his soul, it seemed to come to him as a living reality, and he put his brush down and said, "God help me! Why don't I go to lost people themselves instead of painting pictures of them?" Then and there he consecrated himself to God. He went to Oxford University, and in due course he entered the ministry. After working in the slums of two of our cities, the conviction came to him that he ought to go to that part of the world where men seemed to be most lost. He came to the conclusion that East Africa was the place where he was most wanted. One day there came a message from the Secretary of the Church Missionary Society, asking whether he would be willing to be the leader of a party that was to go to Uganda. In due course he was consecrated Bishop, and he has brought to his high post rare gifts of administration, and an enthusiastic love of souls."

Do Something!

One Sunday morning, far away in one of the islands of the Indian Ocean, a missionary was studying a sermon to preach in the strange language of those countries. A Christianized boy, about half clothed, came in and said, "I would like to do something for Christ." "And what could you do?" said the missionary.

Blushing and stammering, as if afraid to say, he answered, "I will be always there. I will do it loud. Please let me ring the bell." That boy became an evangelist when he grew up. While he was a boy he rang the bell that invited the people to church, and when he became a man he preached to his people the same glad news that he commenced calling the people to hear when he rang the church-bell.

One who has traveled in Europe says: "I stood at the base of one of those giant mountains, whose sides are clothed with glacier and their summits with perpetual snow. A Swiss peasant was near, with his long Alpine horn that rested on two wooden props. Applying his lips to the rude instrument, he wound from it a few notes of the musical scale, which made but little impression on the listener. A moment or two elapsed, and then I was entranced, for far above me, among the icy pinnacles, these artless sounds were converted into chords of exquisite harmony. The melodious echoes—I can compare them to nothing but the aerial symphonies of colossal musical-glasses—seemed to sweep in circle among the heights. They rang out again, and again, and again, lingering still amid precipice and peak; then, gradually softening, they became fainter and fainter, and so died away."

The Helpful Life

The circumstances and occupation of this rustic of the valley not inadequately represent our own as witnesses for Jesus. Our performance of the work entrusted to us may be imperfect, and with little in it to attract the admiration of the world; but if with faith and love we sound out in notes sharp and clear, however artlessly, the truth as it has come into our hearts, there will be many who will be helped and uplifted.

George Macdonald said: "If I can put one touch of a rosy sunset into the life of any man or woman, I shall feel that I have worked with God." John Ruskin said: "If you do not wish for God's kingdom, don't pray for it; but if you do, you must do more than pray for it." In helping others we shall ourselves be helped. "A physician was returning to his home, when he saw a little child in great peril in the street. Another instant she would have been crushed under the iron hoofs which were almost upon her. At great peril to himself he rushed forward, and seizing the little one, bore her in safety to the sidewalk. Curiosity impelled him to look into the child's face that he might see if he knew whom he had rescued. Pushing back the little bonnet, what were his feelings to see that it was his own little daughter whose life he had saved. So he who hastes to save the perishing often finds rewards he little dreamed of. "Whatever thy hands find to do, do it with thy might."

The Power of Song

What is it like in Song? "Go into the village round about you and sing to the people," said a minister to a well-trained choir; "and those of you who can sing, get up little garden parties of sacred singing, where the passers-by can hear you over the wall!" We all remember the story of Carlotta Rosa, who visited the dying child in a wretched tenement, and, standing by the little bed, sang "Angel ever Bright and Fair," till the little one asked, "Is this heaven?" Many a sinful soul has been carried for the moment to heaven by song.

A SCION OF KINGS

By BARBARA E. POPE

Concluded from last week

FROM Assiout the heir of the Orebs journeyed in plain style up the Nile, stopping at every town and at many of the larger villages. The last census could have furnished him with information concerning the mixed population, but he wanted to acquaint himself fully with the people of his own race, and form some estimate of their capabilities.

Burning with zeal and patriotism, he found little encouragement. The fellow, once an intelligent mainstay, were ignorant and had degenerated into mere children of the soil, grateful for a betterment of condition, but unmindful as to the hand that wrote the law. Higher up in the scale were men of pride and thought, men mentally and physically able to follow him into the desert for drill and training, and to march stolidly from the cataracts to the sea. These men, however, were accumulating wealth; and, pleading their numerical weakness and the vast resources and combined strength of the intruders, they felt themselves forced to leave the sceptre where their forefathers had lost it.

To the heart of Nubia and back went the traveler. When he had again passed the wonderful dam, which he knew a sovereign prince of his line could have conceived of and built as effectively, had their power not declined, word came to him that his father was sick and he hastened home, solicitous only of the life of his parents.

For six months Mark Oreb was disabled and Aahmes managed the estates, holding his schemes for restoration in abeyance for the time being, and giving all his attention to the work before him. Agriculture and stock-raising were honorable pursuits, and he was not above looking well into them and setting about, in his energetic way, to put them on the highest scientific basis. Then, there were the fellahs, the humble men and women who worked for his father, and who lived in scant comfort in the village and in mud huts on the estates. Aahmes had not come in contact with these faithful toilers since his boyhood. There were hosts of them around him, and almost as many more on the farm in the Delta. His compassionate heart turned to them, and he saw in them a work which could no longer be neglected.

Joseph Neris had married, and with his bride and his sister was spending his honeymoon at a small country seat a few miles from the city of Cairo, when Aahmes stopped by on his way to the Delta.

Nearly a year had passed since the two friends parted on the day after Kamena's wedding, and Joseph had a good deal to tell about his courtship and marriage and success in his business, which was that of a banker.

"I know that, since my remote ancestors were priests," he said, with a mischievous smile, "I ought to be looking around for a place to offer sacrifices and interpret oracles; but the instinct is dead in me, and I take very naturally to the prosaic intricacies of finance."

"My father has recovered his health, but the infirmities of age are creeping on him and I must relieve him from care," said Aahmes.

"It is a good thing for you," replied Joseph.

"What a picture your wife and Taisu make down there in the soft light amid the flowers and the foliage and the spray of the fountain!" exclaimed Aahmes.

"Let us join them," said Joseph, leading the way from the balcony to the garden.

It was the most delightful season of the year—that immediately preceding the weeks of the inundation—and the garden was a bower of roses of all kinds, with rare shade trees, orchids and poinsettia. Joseph's father had been the first of the native landowners to recognize the adaptability of the soil to ornamental vegetation, and after his death

Taisu had continued the culture of flowers and trees. She and her sister-in-law were, on this occasion, dressed for the evening and had come into the garden at sunset to remain until midnight, when, under the bright light of Egypt's full moon, the farmers would begin to harvest their crops.

"These hours will constitute for us a sort of rural dissipation, an excess which should be permitted every one that has spent months in Cairo," said Taisu, as Aahmes took the vacant seat by her side at the fountain.

"We will not require you to keep guard over us fasting. We have delicious cakes with fruit and rich milk on a table in the olive grove," said Joseph's wife, a good-looking young lady of a practical turn.

"When the eyes of mortal man feast on beauty, there should be no hunger," said Joseph.

"Is that a compliment to us, or, to our surroundings?" asked the bride.

"To yourselves, ladies," answered Aahmes, gallantly and earnestly. In spite of himself, he had been impressed with the appearance of Taisu.

Over a rose-colored silk slip she wore a filmy gown of the same shade, embroidered in gold thread with a delicate tracery of lotus. At her neck she wore a superb antique necklace of brilliants and rubies. A gold asp girdled her waist, and her long flowing sleeves now and then gave to full view the gold asps that coiled around her shapely wrists and the armlets that matched her necklace. Her black hair rippled back from her forehead, and was gathered behind in a loose knot and becomingly ornamented with pendant gems. She confined herself to styles purely Oriental when at home, and was accustomed to being greeted with admiration.

As charming as was Taisu to his sight, Aahmes found a still greater charm in her conversation. Her ideas were near akin to his own, and, as the evening advanced and the newly wedded pair appeared absorbed in each other, he drew himself off wholly to this most attractive of women, and, yearning for sympathy, poured out his soul to her in the moonlight, talking with her over the condition of their country and telling her of his plans for the improvement of his laborers. She, too, was interested in the poor people, and she had worked enthusiastically among the villagers nearby and could give him the benefit of her experience in starting schools for them and lifting them up from their ignorance and squalor. She was teaching them to beautify their homes, and told how little plots of flowers and grass were appearing in front of the mud huts, and how shade trees were being planted here and there on the village streets. There was warm affection in the hearts of the fellahs, and in uplifting them there was solace for one's griefs and something to hope for in the distant future.

"Not in our day do I look forward to Egypt's being free," said the sweet-voiced young woman, as they strolled along one of the walks in the garden, "but we can do our best in working things up to that point and the glory will come hereafter."

"I can see what an advantage your companionship has been to Joseph," said Aahmes.

"We have lived lovingly together, and, although my brother is three years my senior, there have been times when his masculine pride did not rebel against yielding to sisterly influence. Woman is the weaker vessel, but she has always had her place in shaping the destinies of mankind."

"I am beginning to comprehend the situation," said Aahmes, sadly. "Woman can work for weal or woe, and very disastrous can be the woe."

"See! Joseph is beckoning to us. The harvesters are coming," said Taisu.

Everybody arose late the next morning, but, when Aahmes looked from his window, he saw Taisu at the pigeon tower, feeding the pigeons, which were alighting all around her eating tamely from her hand and perching on her shoulders.

After breakfast he followed her into the library to see her collection of curios. There were the usual heirlooms of a well-descended family, and to them she had added fac-similes of inscriptions found in recently excavated tombs and choice pieces of pottery and bits of mosaic. There was a carved image of a woman that especially caught the eye of the visitor, because of its merit as a work of art. Taisu explained that it was one of her latest acquisitions and had been obtained by her at a good price through the friendliness of one of the government officials at the museum.

"It is an image of Taisu, a priestess of Isis, one of the women of our house, who lived in the dim ages of the past. Traditions concerning her have come down to us, and my father named me for her. The image and this roll of papyrus were found not long ago in a tomb at Abusir, her burial place."

"Taisu the priestess. I have read of her and it is very stupid of me never to have connected her with you. Is it only my fancy that the image bears a resemblance to you?"

"Joseph has said the same, but why should it be?"

"There can be singular likenesses and transmissions in a line of pure blood. Have I your permission to read the scroll?"

"With pleasure," answered Taisu, but her look was not joyous. She had been rather subdued all the morning.

The papyrus, read aloud, related in quaint but glowing terms the illustrious lineage and noble deeds of the deceased priestess, and presently the reader came to an attached poem. It was written by the priestess herself, praising the beauty and virtues and lamenting the death of one whom she had known and loved in early life, and whom the goddess had taken to the land of the immortals, in order that the maiden might devote herself to service in the temple.

"How she loved him! She must have given orders to bury the poem with her," commented Aahmes, in a tremulous voice.

Taisu averted her eyes, which were moist.

The young man bowed his head, thinking madly, not of the dead woman, but of the living one beside him.

In duty bound, Taisu inquired about Judith.

"She was well when I last heard from her," was the reply; and then both left the room, he going resolutely to his chamber, and she, biting her lip in anger with herself, seeking the other members of the household. She felt like a criminal and blamed herself for not keeping her room that morning, as prudence had prompted.

Aahmes cut short his visit and left for the big farm in the Delta. From there he meant to go direct to Assiout, but Joseph hunted him up, in obedience to a letter from Madam Oreb, to tenderly break to him the distressing news of Judith's elopement with Mustapha ben Ali, who had renounced his religion for her.

"Her perfidy makes me shudder; but, then, I should not be hard on her," said the discarded lover. "Her father will forgive her and it is well."

It was but natural for Aahmes to return home with Joseph, and, the next time that he and Taisu were alone in the library, there was no inclination to weep or to rail at a miscarriage of fate. He had learned the full meaning of love, and she blushing acknowledged that she had loved him long.

There was another wedding a few weeks later and, to the joy and comfort of Madam Oreb, Aahmes was the devoted bridegroom and Taisu the happy bride.

EASTER BELLS

Words by Margaret E. Sangster

Music by Hubert P. Main

Sprightly.

1. Chime, solemn bells of Easter, The shadows flee away, And all the earth is smiling In the glo-ry of the day, In the glo-ry of the day.

CHORUS.

Ring, ten-der bells of Easter; Be-yond our toil and tears, There wait for all the faith-ful, Heav'n's long and happy years.

Break, joyous bells of Easter! From far across the sea
Bring us the endless music of immortality.

Triumphant bells of Easter, again by angels rung,
Speak comfort to the sorrowing of every land and tongue.

Blend, golden bells of Easter, Heaven's fairest and its best,
To hush earth's clamorous discords and soothe earth's sad unrest.

We will march at his command.
Where he leads, the stars, combining,
Beckon onward by their shining.

Christian hands and hearts, uniting
For the good that can be done,
Find a field with work inviting,
Close at hand for every one.
At thy door, O Christian brother,
Seek to find and win another!

In thy seeking, do not falter;
Gladly give a helping hand.
Just a word or deed may alter

Base design to purpose grand.
Raise the fallen; ever labor
For the uplift of thy neighbor.

Years are flying faster, faster,
Let us work with might and main.
'Neath the eye of Christ, our Master,
Christian work is not in vain.
Hand in hand we join in labors
For a world where all are neighbors.

Jesus, Saviour! Nought availeth
Unless thou thy blessing give.
When the serpent, sin, assaileth,
We will look to thee and live!
In the mansions bright, supernal,
Life thou givest, life eternal.

DIDN'T KNOW

That Coffee Was Causing Her Trouble

So common is the use of coffee as a beverage, many do not know that it is the cause of many obscure ailments which are often attributed to other things.

The easiest way to find out for oneself is to quit the coffee for a while, at least, and see the results. A Virginia lady found out in this way, and also learned of a new beverage which is wholesome as well as pleasant to drink. She writes:

"I am 40 years old and all my life, up to a year and a half ago, I had been a coffee drinker. About ten years ago, I had dyspepsia so bad that often the coffee I drank would sour on my stomach and I could not retain it.

"Severe headaches and heart weakness made me feel sometimes as though I was about to die. After drinking a cup or two of hot coffee, not knowing it was harmful, my heart would go like a clock without a drum. At other times it would almost stop and I was so nervous I did not like to be alone.

"If I took a walk for exercise, as soon as I was out of sight of the house I'd feel as though I was sinking and this would frighten me terribly. My limbs would utterly refuse to support me, and the pity of it all was, I did not know that coffee was causing the trouble.

"Reading in the papers that many people were relieved of such ailments by leaving off coffee and drinking Postum, I got my hands to bring home a package. We made according to directions and I liked the cup. Its rich, snappy flavour was delicious.

"I have been using Postum about eight months, and to my great joy, digestion is good, my nerves and heart are all right. In fact, I am a well woman once more, thanks to Postum."

The Cost of a Roof

The cost of a good roof is merely the cost of the roofing and the labor of laying it. The cost of a poor roof is all that and more. Poor roofs mean frequent repairs; on houses—ruined walls, carpets and furniture; on barns—spoiled stores; on poultry houses—lost chickens; on factories—damaged machinery and products. REX Flintkote Roofing is sold at a price but little higher than the poor imitations, and much lower than shingles, slate or gravel. It costs little to lay.

REX FLINTKOTE ROOFING

Because any man can lay it alone, and everything needed for laying comes in the roll. REX Flintkote Roofing gives all, lasting protection. It not only protects against rain and snow, but against dampness, heat and cold. Being a fire-resistant it prevents communication of fire through flying sparks and firebrands.

Write for Free Book and Samples

The book will tell you all about REX Flintkote roofing and give photographs of buildings on which it is used, with letters of recommendation from users. The samples will show you what REX Flintkote Roofing really is and enable you to test its properties and prove our claims.

The Booklovers' Shakespeare

THE great classics of the world are always demanding a new interpretation, a fresh presentation. The Iliad and Odyssey, for example, have been translated into English again and again, because great works like these may be presented from many different points of view, and because each age requires that such masterworks be rendered in its own idiom and spirit. Ever since the First Folio of Shakespeare, the earliest collected edition of the dramatist's works, numberless commentators have exercised their scholarship and ingenuity in analyzing these remarkable productions and countless editions have been placed upon the market. Many of the really good critical editions have now become antiquated through the advance of scholarship and progress of time. They have served their purpose well in their own day, but they are no longer abreast of modern research. Many other editions were prepared in a totally inadequate fashion, and some depended almost wholly on more or less gaudy mechanical features for any value that they might possess. Others were intended either for class-room use, or for advanced students who were interested in minute dissection.

It is with special pleasure, therefore, that we commend to the attention of our readers the forty-volume "Booklovers' Shakespeare" (The University Society Inc., New York), which is perhaps the best edition for general use that is now offered to the public. This edition is extremely handy. The volumes are just the right size for comfortable use. The illustrative features are unusually full, including forty fine full-page colored plates and some 400 text cuts, many of which are reproduced from publications of Shakespeare's own time, and throw an interesting light upon references and allusions in the plays.

But the most important thing about this edition is the remarkably generous amount of notes and other helps that it contains for the use of the general reader. Almost every recognized authority on Shakespeare is represented in this explanatory matter. The arguments tell the story of every play. The extracts from noted authors explain the action of every play and the characters introduced in it. The two sets of notes make clear every line of the text and the glossaries define every obscure word and expression. To these are added lists of questions which furnish for every one a private study course in their own home. One volume is devoted to a Topical Index, by means of which every reference may be located immediately.

To eulogize Shakespeare here would be superfluous. We wish merely to welcome this new edition as being in our view the most worthy for those who wish to make a permanent and delightful addition to their library.

The advertisement of Booklovers' Shakespeare appears on page 319 of this issue.

Paton and His Colleagues

MORE thrilling than one of the old romances is the story of the work in which John G. Paton spent his life. Above forty years of labor and peril he passed in his beloved field of the New Hebrides. Born in Scotland in 1824, he served in the home field in the Glasgow slums, until the way opened for him to go to the heathen in the Southern Pacific. "When I first went to the New Hebrides," he said, speaking in 1900 in New York, "I found the people in the most degraded condition. They were cannibals and were constantly warring among themselves. To-day there are 18,000 converts, among whom are three hundred preachers and teachers. In every family daily worship is held, and every one, old and young, faithfully attends the house of God."

The change was not worked without great danger to the missionary. Time and again the murderous club was raised over his head, and only by the intervention of divine providence was his life preserved. In the same islands, though not in the same group, Williams and Chalmers were murdered, and now comes the news that on the Solomon Islands another missionary has been murdered and his body devoured at a cannibal feast. From Paton's home on the Island of Aniwa, the Christian influence went out that subdued the savage nature wherever it could make itself felt, and one island after another was transformed. How much toil and privation the change involved can never be known. Paton has gone to his reward but devoted men have taken his place and are carrying forward the work, undeterred by the labor and danger it costs.

The American Board's work in the islands has been frequently described in these pages. Mr. Price and other missionaries have labored with similar success to that of the London Missionary Society's agents. In the New Caledonia Islands, as in the New Hebrides, the Loyalties, New Guinea, Gilbert and other groups the standard of the cross has been raised and not only have converts been won, but volunteers have come forward offering themselves to go to other islands with the glad tidings of salvation. A visitor who recently attended a meeting in Vatorata, New Guinea, saw there a tablet on which were inscribed the names of eighty-seven native preachers who had been killed in this noble service. They had not counted their lives dear unto them.

Christian Fatalism†

VERY different from Oriental fatalism is the faith that holds the Christian true to his course in spite of danger and menace of violence. The philosophy of the Orient is illustrated in the proverb quoted by Emerson that, "On two days it steads not to run from thy grave: the appointed and the unappointed day; on the first, no physicians nor medicines can save, nor thee, on the second, the universe slay." But that is a dull, spiritless confidence in a mechanical destiny unworthy of comparison with the courage that comes from seeing Him who is invisible, and in whose hands "all things work together for good to them that love God." The fatalist yields to defeat and death, because he must and because it is written in the book of fate; the Christian yields because it is the will of his heavenly Father, which in the end will prove to be the highest wisdom and love. The decree of the one as irresistible as the other, but the one is austere and unintelligent and the other tender, wise and sympathetic.

Let no one think it is possible to draw the line that separates the will and liberty of man from the control of God. Many have tried, but the world has never produced the philosopher equal to the task. Every man knows in his conscience that he is responsible for what he does. He knows as he balances in his mind two courses of action, that he is free to take one or the other; even the suicide is conscious as he raises the poisonous draught to his lips, that it is within his power to cast it undrunk to the ground. Yet we are taught that death and life are in God's hands and that he has perfect control of the issues. The one belief appears irreconcilable with the other, but both are true, and in the region beyond the grave where our mental powers are increased, the mystery will be made plain.

The one fact of which we must keep firm hold is that of human responsibility. We have no right to charge the Deity with complicity in our actions. His purposes he has kept strictly within his own mind and he has left us free to do his will or to oppose it for a time. In the end that will is invincible, but now he bears patiently with his creatures who rebel, hoping that ere the hour of vengeance dawns they will submit and say from their hearts, "Thy will be done."

The Bible at a Glance

THIS Book contains the mind of God, the state of man, the way of salvation, the doom of sinners and the happiness of believers. Its doctrines are holy, its precepts are binding, its histories are true, and its decisions are immutable. Read it to be wise, believe it to be safe and practise it to be holy. It contains light to direct you, food to support you and comfort to cheer you. It is the traveler's map, the pilgrim's staff, the pilot's compass, the soldier's sword and the Christian's charter. Here Paradise is restored, heaven opened and the gates of hell closed. Christ is its grand object, our good its design, and the glory of God its end. It should fill the memory, rule the heart and guide the feet. Read it slowly, frequently and prayerfully; it is a mine of wealth, a Paradise of glory and a river of pleasure. It is given you in life, will be opened in the judgment, and be remembered forever. It involves the highest responsibility, will reward the greatest labor, and will condemn all who trifle with its sacred contents.

Called Higher

Mrs. Edwin Clement, who passed from this earthly life lately at the home of her daughter, Mrs. David Jackson, Millbrook, N. Y., had been a great sufferer. She was an earnest Christian, faithful in good works, and a most devoted wife and mother.

C. W. Boyer entered into rest after a long and painful illness, at the home of his father in Dallas, Tex. He was a constant reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and often spoke of the benefit he felt he received from its columns. A Christian, he met death without fear.

Miss Ida C. Fritz, of Boyertown, Pa., perished in the fire at Boyertown on January 13, 1908. She was widely known as a young woman of fine Christian character. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD had been a great pleasure to her, having been a weekly visitor in the home for many years.

Mrs. John H. Jett departed this life lately at Gainesville, Tex., at the age of eighty-two years. She was a member of the Greenville Baptist Church since she was twelve years old, being one of the charter members of the church. She had been a subscriber to this paper for a number of years.

Miss Nellie Taylor, of Washington, Ind., passed to the better land recently, after a long illness. She had been an active Christian worker, and called her Sunday School about her a short time before she died. Her words to them at that solemn moment made a lasting impression on their hearts.

Mrs. Elizabeth Pulliam entered into rest at Echo, N. Y. "She was one of your old subscribers," writes one of the family, "and lover of your paper. She praised THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on her dying bed; said it had been a great guide and light to her. Hoped it would help many others to prepare for the great call."

Mrs. Adelia Brown Bentley died recently at her home at Atlantic Highlands, N. J. She was eighty-five years of age and was one of the pioneers of the town. She had been a church member for sixty-five years and was prominent in Christian work. At her funeral it was said her beautiful life preached a sermon in itself.

Mrs. Emily Webster Gallup, widow of Benjamin Lee Gallup, died recently in East Woodstock, Conn. She had been in failing health for some years. Mrs. Gallup was born in Woodstock, November 28, 1836. Her death is a loss to the communities in which she has lived so long. To her church, being a member of the West Woodstock Baptist Church, she was devoted to the last.

Mrs. Sallie Stanford Bradshaw, one of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's most venerable and constant readers in the South, died recently at the age of seventy-eight years, in Halifax County, Virginia. She was a woman of fine Christian character and a member of the Methodist Church for more than sixty years. She was the last but one of the surviving granddaughters of Hon. Richard Stanford, for twenty years member of Congress from North Carolina, and a contemporary of Webster, Clay and Randolph, and the first member of Congress to be called "Father of the House," a title bestowed upon him by Mr. Randolph in a congressional debate in 1811.

LOST $300

Buying Medicine when Right Food was Needed

Money spent for "tonics" and "bracers" to relieve indigestion, while the poor old stomach is loaded with pastry and pork, is worse than losing a pocketbook containing the money.

If the money only is lost its bad enough, but with lost health from wrong eating, it is hard to make the money back.

A Mich. young lady lost money on drugs but is thankful she found a way to get back her health by proper food. She writes:—

"I had been a victim of nervous dyspepsia for six years and spent three hundred dollars for treatment in the attempt to get well. None of it did me any good.

Finally I tried Grape-Nuts food, and the results were such that, if it cost a dollar a package, I would not be without it. My trouble had been caused by eating rich food, such as pastry and pork.

"The most wonderful thing that ever happened to me, I am sure, was the change in my condition after I began to eat Grape-Nuts. I began to improve at once and the first week gained four pounds.

"I feel that I cannot express myself in terms that are worthy of the benefit Grape-Nuts has brought to me, and you are perfectly free to publish this letter if it will send some poor sufferer relief, such as has come to me."

Jesus' Condescension

By Mrs. M. BAXTER

NEVER was there a life in which there was greater leisure than in the life of Jesus. Everything was in perfect proportion, because all was arranged by a Master-hand. There was no lapping of one duty or occupation over another, there was no hurry, no fear that the time taken up in the present service would make the next one run short of time; the time and strength given fitted the work exactly. Jesus did not do all that man expected of him, but his yielded will fitted into his Father's plan, so that he always had leisure to do what the Father called him to do. Oh, how we need this close walk with God, which leaves room for the will of God, and waits in loving reverence and confidence for the unfolding of his plan, in order to work into it without a dissentient thought!

"I am so hindered at home," says a busy mother, whose children and servants provide her with endless occupation, and yet whose heart is in the mothers' meeting, the temperance gathering, the mission service. But in the broken crockery, the spoiled dinner, the torn frock, the wilful boy, there is a wide field for the manifestation of God's victory in herself and in her family; and that, in things so practical that, when she gets to the meeting her words are more blessed, because she can tell the people from deep experience how real God is in daily life.

"I cannot go on with my business," says a brother; "there is so much competition and selfish grasping in trade, and unprincipled people do so get it into their own hands, that I stand no chance if I follow God closely; I must give it up, and take to evangelizing." But think of the tens of thousands of men of business on whose behalf God needs one who shall be able to bear witness to them from experience that God does enter into business matters, and does deliver his children in business, as well as in other trials, when they really count on him to do it. God has, for each life given up to him, an exact plan into which he wills that life should exactly fit, even to its smallest details.

Jesus himself was at leisure from the overwhelming load which was coming upon him; at leisure to teach his disciples. The Passover feast had just been celebrated by them, that feast which meant more to him who was "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world" than any of the disciples could know. He "loved his own which were in the world," although they had just been striving among themselves "which of them should be accounted the greatest" and have the first place (Luke 22: 24), and he knew that in a few hours' time every one of them would forsake him and flee.

Supper was ended, but one thing had been left undone; they had not, as was customary among the Jews, washed before eating. Oh, how many there are who want to sit down with Jesus in sweet communion without being first fully cleansed? But only One can remedy this evil; it is himself. The vessels for cleansing were there, but it was the office of a slave to wash the feet, and they who had just been striving as to which was greatest amongst them, were in no mood to offer themselves for the slave's work. Only One was sufficiently at leisure from himself to undertake this service—it was Jesus himself. He rose from supper, put aside his outer garments, took a towel, girded himself, poured out water, and began to do the slave's work, to wash his disciples' feet.

The Master knelt before them one by one until he came to Peter. All was silence up to this moment, the silent rebuke of the serving Master was going home to each heart; but Peter, the ever forward Peter, spoke out, "Lord, dost thou wash my feet?" Jesus answered and said unto him: "What I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter." What a word this has been to broken hearts, and, oh, how has patient confidence in God been rewarded when his children were willing to trust him out of their sight! How often has the removal of one missionary to a higher service above been used of God to stir the hearts of many more to take his place!

THAT was indeed a period of revolutions, and the revolution that was effected in the manufacture of Soap by the introduction of PEARS' SOAP was so memorable that it established a new and permanent standard in Toilet Soaps, and one that it has been impossible to improve upon in all the years that have since elapsed.

PEARS' SOAP was a scientific discovery that represented hygienic perfection, and provided beauty with a simple preservative that has had no equal from that day to this.

We have it on the testimony of the most famous beauties, and of leading scientists, doctors, and specialists, from the Georgian to the Edwardian period, that PEARS' SOAP is the most potent of all aids to natural beauty—the beauty that alone can fascinate—the beauty of a soft, velvety, refined complexion.

Questions and Answers

A. McL., Starkweather, N. D. How did the Israelites get the name of "Hebrews"?

According to some authorities, the name is derived from Heber, the patriarch (Gen. 10: 24); and according to others, it comes from eber, meaning "between" or "on the other side." The name "Hebrew" was first applied to Abraham by the Canaanites (Gen. 14: 13), when he crossed the Euphrates.

L. F. Q., Thetford Centre, Vt. Why, as a Christian nation, must we withdraw the Word of God from our schools? A few years since, in a Sunday School convention in this State, it was declared that never so great ignorance of the Word of God existed among our young people as to-day.

In many schools the Bible is still read daily. The effort to get it wholly withdrawn from the schools was not successful. It is the object of certain anti-Christians to exclude it altogether, on the ground that the schools, under constitutional law, should be non-sectarian. Sectarian teaching, of course, is not allowed in the schools.

Reader, Claremont, Ont., Can. 1. What is right in the matter of using words such as "blamed" and "darned," as "I'll be darned," etc., and "Great Scott!" and "By Jove," and other such expressions? 2. What would you say of those who have truly repented of past sins or mistakes and are sincerely seeking to live true Christian lives, yet cannot forget their past sins, and at times brood over them?

1. These are simply substitutes for expletives—a clownish way of escaping from saying the real thing. Sensible people avoid them altogether and talk in a straightforward manner. Expletives and kindred expressions never add to the force of remarks and are vulgar, if not worse. 2. Regret over past sins is natural, but it may be indulged inordinately. Such people should pray for faith to take God at his word and to realize that sins once pardoned are pardoned forever.

Subscriber, Mariaville, Me. Is it modest, delicate or respectable for women who profess to be Christians to go to church bareheaded?

It is not customary for women to go to church bareheaded, although we believe it is done occasionally at summer resorts, camp meetings, etc. This is altogether different from the matter of sitting in church with wide-spreading head-gear, obscuring the vision of those behind you. We heartily approve of women attending without hats in church, or wearing head-dresses of a style that will not interfere with the comfort of others.

D. L. W., Gandy, Neb. If a minister's credentials are revoked, has he a right to perform the marriage ceremony, and if he should do so, would it be legal?

If he is no longer a pastor in good standing and with official recognition, he occupies precisely the same position as a layman, and is morally prohibited from performing the duties of his office. If, however, it is merely a question of temporary non-fellowship, he may still have the right to exercise pastoral functions with respect to preaching, marriages, baptisms, etc. In any event, it is wise to select a clergyman in good standing.

M. L. W., Greenfield, O. Ought not Christian people to remonstrate against the profanity of some men in high position? I have seen a statement that the lips of some prominent statesmen drip with profanity, and some of our journals seem to make a jest of it.

Profanity is unfortunately too common among a certain class of politicians. It would not be amiss to send them an occasional tract on the subject. They might be reminded, also, that in certain States there is a law against it.

Jo, Hillsdale, N. Y. Will you kindly describe the making and use of the hay box as a fireless cooker?

It is made of stout timbers, with a lighter box inside, leaving a space of about two inches between the inner and outer boxes. The inner box is lined with felt and may be made in two divisions. It has a tight-fitting lid, which is also lined with felt. The lid of the outer box is heavily hinged and the interior of the outer box is lined throughout with felt. Food, which it is desired to keep warm or to cook, is put in the inner box while boiling, or at maximum heat. The lid is then replaced tightly and the space between the two boxes is tightly packed with hay, a good pad of close-pressed hay being put on the top of the inner box. The outer lid is then shut tight. Such a "cooker" retains the heat for many hours and can be easily and cheaply manufactured.

Reader, Larsen, Wis. 1. Did Napoleon Bonaparte have a son? If so, when and where was he born, and what station (if any) did he fill? 2. What became of the little Monitor that fought the Merrimac in 1862? Was it ever raised from the ocean bottom?

1. Yes; Napoleon II., born 1811, died in 1832. His mother was Napoleon's second placed. This measured charge of powder is in a cloth bag; it is not loose. The explosion referred to was caused by a spark dropping on the cloth powder bag. The photographs you mentioned showed the shells only. The explosive charge in them is set off by the heat of the impact on the enemy's ship. This charge is not visible, as it is encased. The charge that sends the shell to its mark would only be seen in a photograph of a gun in action, where it is passed quickly to the man loading. They are never left about, but guarded under cover with great care. The smaller rapid-fire guns have bullet and powder fastened together. The sailors sometimes use the term cartridge for the powder bag alone.

E. E. S., Oskaloosa, Ia. Who has the laureateship of England now?

Alfred Austin. He was born at Headingly, near Leeds, England, in 1835. He had deceived thee, and I have brought five pounds in my pocket that I desire thee to accept, as I believe it to be about the difference in their value. Strangely enough the other had had the thought about the horse he bought and had actually brought the same sum to offer to his friend. After a little pleasant conversation, they concluded to their bargain and each take home his money. Surely these men each loved his neighbor as himself.

L. McC., Willard, Mo. 1. How did the United States flag get the name of "Old Glory"? Did the people in olden times worship before Christ came into the world? 3. Is it a sin to waste food by throwing it for fun?

1. The name "Old Glory" was first given to the American flag in 1831, by V. Driver, a sea captain of Salem, Mass. He was preparing his brig, the Charles D. Gell, for a trip to the southern Pacific. A party of friends presented him with a beautiful American flag. When it flung to the breeze the captain christened it "Old Glory." In 1837 Captain Driver moved to Nashville, Tenn. When Union Army entered Nashville, Feb. 1862, Captain Driver presented the flag to General Nelson, and the captain hoisted it on the State capitol. The soldiers learned its story, and the name "Old Glory" was given to all the flags. 2. Yes; the Bible and all history show it. 3. It is assuredly a sin to waste any of God's gifts.

Philadelphia's Anti-Saloon Parade

TWO thousand school children of Philadelphia paraded a few days ago through the leading thoroughfares of that city, in protest against the saloons. It was a pretty sight to witness these enthusiastic young crusaders bearing their banners and marching proudly to military music. Great crowds lined the sidewalks along the route and cheered the children.

Reader, Bertrand, Neb. What is the international date line?

It is an imaginary meridional line 180° from Greenwich, running through Bering Strait and through the Pacific Ocean. East of the line the day is dated one day earlier than west of it.

J. D., Jamestown, Kan. When practising with big guns on warships, do the gunners handle balls and powder separately, or do they use cartridges already loaded (as we do with common hand rifles)? You referred to an accident, not long since, by which it would seem that powder was being handled loose—while, on the other hand, I have various photographs, showing gunners at practice with loaded shells.

The projectile and powder are only combined in the smaller guns. The projectile for the big guns is first inserted; immediately behind it the powder charge is

A. G., Port Huron, Mich. Of what nationality was Alexander Hamilton, and was he born on the island of Jamaica?

Alexander Hamilton was the son of James Hamilton, a Scotchman belonging to the family of Hamilton of Grange, in Ayrshire, Scotland. The patriot's mother was of French descent. Hamilton was born January 11, 1757, on the island of Nevis, in the West Indies.

Ellen S., Poplar Ridge, N. Y., writes:

Your reply to A. J., Auburn, N. Y., reminds me of a pretty little story of two members of the Friends' Church (my own, by the way) many years ago. One had a horse which was good in harness, but not easy to ride; the other had a good saddle horse but wanted a carriage horse; so they agreed to exchange. Meeting again some months later, one said, "Well, A —, how dost thou like thy horse?" "Why, so well, I thought I

HOW A MANDARIN'S WIFE ENTERTAINS

By Evelyn Clark Morgan

WE started in our sedan chairs, with three bearers each, etiquette requiring at least that number for a social call. Our way lay through narrow, crowded, none too clean streets until at last we came to a somewhat wider and canner street in the fashionable quarter of Foochow. There was little to show that it was the fashionable quarter, for there were no windows opening upon the street, nor cheerful aspect of any kind; just a row of huge, barn-like doors lining the street on either side. Before one of these doors our coolies paused.

They knocked, the wide doors were opened and we entered a large court, empty except for a number of slat chairs ranged against the side walls. Here our bearers stopped, keeping our chairs suspended in mid-air, while we sent our cards in by one of the servants who approached to take them from our hands. We had been invited, but this was the proper way of finding out whether the Tai-tai was ready to receive us.

Soon the message came: "Would we do Madame the honor to enter?" Then we were carried to the next court and put down. Between the two courts was a sill of upright board at least twelve inches high, such as are found not only between the courts, but between the rooms in Chinese houses. The inner court was more ornamental than the outer. There were plants and potted flowers standing about, and there were carvings and ornamentation upon the inner side of the partition that divided the two courts, as well as upon the framework surrounding the windows. The entire front of the reception room was open and the rooms on either side were closed in by glass only.

At the sill of the reception room, Madame Lu stood ready to receive us. She was elegantly gowned and her coiffure was elaborate and becoming. Her pretty face—she has the straight features and oval-shaped face so greatly admired in China—was beaming with smiles and beauty as, clasping her small jeweled hands, she agitated them gently three times in token of welcome. The Chinese are very ceremonious and the height to which they raise their clasped hands, and the profundity of their bow, depends upon what they think a person's rank or dignity of position demands. This is the case more particularly with men; women do not raise the hands high in salutation.

In the middle of the room which we entered stood a square table with covers laid for six. The table appointments were dainty in the extreme. Tiny plates of transparent porcelain and quaint-looking forks and spoons rested upon a cloth of richly embroidered silk. A small plant in blossom was the only floral decoration, and this was changed from time to time for others of equal fragrance and beauty.

We were at once asked to take our places at the table, the guest of honor being seated at the left of the hostess, and at the corner of the table furthest from the door. If the Tai-tai had been entertaining only Chinese ladies, each one would probably have insisted upon taking the lowliest seat. In the effort to do so they would have changed places many times, and the hostess might have been half an hour or more in seating her guests. I, at least, not being sufficiently familiar with Chinese etiquette to know how long this polite insistence should be kept up, thought it best to take and keep the seat assigned me by my hostess.

As soon as we were seated, our cups were filled (indeed, they were never allowed to be empty) with delicious scented tea. This was made by a servant at a side table. A handsome lacquered centrepiece for holding fruits was next placed upon the table. There were seven or eight kinds of dried fruits in its various divisions, among them dates, "dragon's eye," pumpkin and watermelon seeds. Tai-tai Lu handed each of us a few of the different kinds of these fruits, lifting them from the centrepiece with her fingers and depositing them on our plates. This was equivalent to saying that she greatly esteemed us and was pleased to serve us. Several courses followed, the foundation of which seemed to be rice and the flavoring fruits. There were small sugared biscuits, too, and then followed toasted slices of New Year's cake. We had silver forks that closely resembled an olive pick, but had some of the characteristics of the chop-stick. Their two tines were long and extremely pliable, and with them we were supposed to hold the thin slice of sugared rice while we nibbled at it.

"Here's a state of things," I thought; "here's a how-d'ye-do." At a Chinese feast, it is good form to eat whatever is put before you, but how to manage this hot delicacy "with a bare bodkin," so to speak, I did not know. It was a question whether to pierce the morsel or to secure it between the unsteady tines. I chose the latter and it took all my ingenuity and skill to keep the portion in the grasp of the elusive fork.

While we were still at the table, four prettily dressed young daughters, with reddened lips and cheeks, entered the room and were presented to us. Their ages were from seven to fifteen, and their manner was as sweet and charming as a little maiden's well could be. One of them opened some loose-jacketed oranges, and, separating the sections, passed from one guest to another, serving two or three lobes to each person.

Several numbers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sent by an American friend lay upon the table, and Madame showed us some silk wristlets from the same source.

When, after a somewhat lengthy visit, we suggested going, the Tai-tai said she so seldom had an opportunity to converse with American ladies that she hoped we would remain longer, adding, "I invite you to my private apartment."

There we found foreign paper on the walls (the walls themselves were of bamboo with plaster coat),

The Children of the Taotai of Hupek

KINDLING THE REVIVAL FIRES

IN consequence of the retirement of the Rev. James B. Ely from the management of the Gospel tent and open-air work in New York City, the spiritual campaign out-doors during the coming season will be under new generalship. Rev. Arthur J. Smith, who will have charge of the work, is a native of Canada. He came to this country when ten years old and has had a remarkable career as a preacher, evangelist and soul-winner. He was formerly associated with Dwight L. Moody, J. Wilbur Chapman, B. Fay Mills and other leading Gospel workers. From 1896 to 1900 he was the pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Savannah, Ga., where he conducted a successful spiritual pastorate. Since leaving Savannah he has given himself up exclusively to evangelism, and has taken part in some of the most successful spiritual movements in this country in recent years. The Rev. A. F. Schauffler is chairman of the Executive Committee of the tent and open-air work this year, and Rev. C. L. Goodell is chairman of the General Committee.

For three years past, Dr. Ely planned and superintended the summer campaigns of the New York Evangelistic Committee. He came to the metropolis in 1905 from similar work in Philadelphia. Open-air meetings were established in many places where tents could not be located, the character of such meetings, like those held in the tents, being determined by the surroundings and the character of the audience. The work was one of many ramifications and employed a large corps of active participants, including pastors, evangelists, singers, children's workers, visitors and volunteers. The foreign element in New York's population was not neglected, and each year there were tents at which the Italians and other foreign nationalities were especially represented. In some cases, these tents have been the foundation work of permanent churches. Concerning his efforts in New York, Dr. Ely frankly admits his inability to estimate in numbers the souls that have been reached in these years. He says, "We have seen people kneel, lift their hands, heard their confessions; we have seen the effect of the Gospel in homes and individual hearts; we have seen the power of God upon the communities and the crowds; we have seen organizations formed and missions arise. We have seen some unite with the churches. Workers and ministers have expressed the blessing they have received." Reviewing Dr. Ely's labors, the evangelistic committee says, "The permanent results of his three years' work can never be tabulated or measured; but we believe that many hundreds, if not thousands, of lives have received lasting blessing in Christ Jesus."

Philadelphia Revival Incidents

THE first half of the Chapman-Alexander Mission in Philadelphia is now concluded, and the evangelists have begun a concerted attack on more than twenty new districts. During the last part of the mission, the campaign will be pushed forward on a still larger scale, with more noon meetings in theatres and factories; more afternoon services in the churches; more saloon meetings, midnight services and special gatherings of every description to reach all classes. Thousands have already confessed Christ at the meetings.

Perhaps the most striking development thus far is the organization of the Pocket Testament League. Its object is to induce people to read at least one chapter in the Bible daily, and to carry a Bible or Testament with them wherever they go. The league was originated years ago by Mrs. Charles M. Alexander. Mrs. Alexander sends THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers this account of the movement:

"When I was about fifteen years old, and attending High School in Birmingham, I was very eager to make the best use of my time there by trying to lead some of my schoolmates to Christ. It was a great opportunity, for the school was made up of girls representing all kinds of denominations and forms of religious belief. Several of us who were Christians banded ourselves together to get hold of individual girls. We made use of recess times and any odd moments that we could find, for quiet talk and were surprised that many of the girls whom we expected to resent it, were only too glad to talk with us about spiritual things. By degrees we discovered something that was a difficulty. We often wanted to turn to a certain passage in the Bible and actually show it in black and white; but walking around the playground, for instance, no Bible would be handy. We therefore resolved that we would carry a Bible with us or at least a Testament, and even had special pocket made for them in our dresses. We found this at once to be such a help that we formed what we called a 'Pocket Testament League.' There were three simple conditions of membership: Firstly, that each girl should read the Bible daily; secondly, carry at least a Testament always with her; thirdly, try to lead people definitely to Christ. This proved a great help to our work in school, and quite a number of girls who had been brought up in worldly, careless surroundings, became earnest Christians. It is my prayer that God will use the League to bring many to Christ, and to strengthen those who come to him in the work of soul-winning."

Membership cards will be sent free of cost to any one who wishes to join. Address The Pocket Testament League, 518 Witherspoon Building, Philadelphia.

The noon-day meetings for business men at the Garrick Theatre, conducted by Chapman and Alexander, continue to be one of the greatest forces of the campaign. At a recent meeting, Dr. Chapman read a letter which made a powerful impression. The letter follows:

While a well-known evangelist was conducting a meeting one morning, a tramp came in and said, "My father and mother used to sit in this pew. It is the first church I ever attended. My father was an officer in this church. Seven boys used to sit in this pew in the Sunday School class. We had a great love and respect for our Sunday School teacher. Saturday afternoon she invited us to her home for an entertainment of music, eatables and a look over the lesson. After a while she was anxious to please us and hold us, and she taught us the names of cards. None had ever used cards. We became enthusiastic over it, learning different games. We would say, 'Do not give us so much time to the lesson, but let us have more time for playing cards, and show us some more tricks.' After a while we were off in the cotton gins playing cards and not going to her home. Later we failed to go to Sunday School. Cards and cigarettes were followed by drink and gambling. We all at different times left our homes. Two of those boys have been hung, three are in State prison for life, one a vagabond like myself. No one knows where he is and if the authorities knew I was here I would be arrested and put behind the bars. All I wish is, that that teacher had never taught us to play cards."

As he stood there broken-hearted, a lady near the pulpit, dressed in mourning, arose, went to where the man was, fell on the floor and said, "Oh God! I am the Sunday School teacher that did it." She fainted, but revived, and was not seen in the meeting any more.

A day after reading this letter, Dr. Chapman received the following letter from a business man who had been present, showing how the truth had gone home:

DR. CHAPMAN: I want to thank you for something God used you to do for me to-day at the Garrick. While I know that I am a Christian, I have always had cards in the house and occasionally played, but they had no particular attraction, and I sincerely and honestly say that I never saw harm in having them or playing as we did. But your story of the teacher and her boys to-day opened my eyes, as well as my wife's (who unknown to me was in the gallery of the theatre), and to-night when we go home, we burn all of the cards. We have a God that we can't afford to run any risk about. May God bless you.

Many thrilling and remarkable conversions are occurring in the Philadelphia meetings. One night a minister who had given up preaching and come to Philadelphia to engage in other pursuits, wandered into one of the churches. He was so deeply convicted by the sermon, that at its conclusion he went forward and confessed his wrong-doing, and declared that he would come back to God with all his heart. He stated that a few minutes before entering the church he had been on the eve of committing suicide.

Through the mail, the evangelists receive many touching letters, some telling of the terrible bondage of sin, and others of complete transformation through the power of Christ. One business woman was so discouraged that she was about to end her life, and then was soundly converted. She wrote Dr. Chapman that the words of a sermon which he preached on March 18 in the Garrick Theatre were in her ears as plainly as if God spoke them, and kept her "from turning on the gas and going to hell."

IN THE HEART OF THE ALLEGHANIES

A Chicken Farm in the Heart of the Blue Ridge

Breaking the Ground on a Mountain Farm

EVERY year people are taking more interest in the spiritual and material welfare of those sturdy and patriotic mountaineers who dwell along the ridges reaching down from Pennsylvania to South Carolina on the back of eight States. They are descendants of early settlers who sought homes on the mountains as far back as the days of the old French wars, and when King George of England still held undisputed sway over the British colonies.

Lucius B. Compton

These mountaineers fought bravely for their country's independence. Some of the people in the mountains about Asheville, N. C., are descendants of colonists who were driven back from the lowlands by British troops while making campaigns in the Carolinas. Men from the mountains fought in the war of 1812.

Through every struggle in which the country has been engaged, these people have done honor to the heroic

Anglo-Saxon stock from which they sprang. Over 180,000 of them fought for the preservation of the Union. The little pamphlet issued by Berea College states proudly that the "flag waved above the clouds" on Lookout was made by mountain women near Berea.

The mountain people kept to themselves, and as they are proud they have asked few favors. But now the younger generation is reaching out for the opportunities that the young people in the lowlands receive. They are going out to schools and colleges, and schools and churches are being established.

Mr. J. B. Mitchell, of Cleveland, Tenn., is devoting his time to mountain mission work. He not only looks after the spiritual interest of the mountaineers in his great mountain parish of several ranges, but also takes clothing to the very poor, and advises them on matters affecting their material welfare, endeavoring to make them feel that he is a warm personal friend as well as a preacher at the meetings held at mountain schoolhouses or in log cabins. Last summer two of his helpers spent most of the time in horseback tours among the ranges of East Tennessee and western North Carolina. They received a most hearty welcome from all with whom they came in contact. The spirit of hospitality is universal.

Most of these hardy mountaineers live in small settlements on the side of the mountains, or in little "coves" in the valleys. The cabins are either of logs or of one thickness of boarding, in most cases with puncheon floors and doors. The chimneys are made of small sticks covered with clay or mud. In the last report Mr. Mitchell said: "Many of the children were going about half clad and with no shoes, but with pieces of cloth tied around their little feet. Our hearts went out in sympathy to them. Many times when we would meet them we felt like taking off our hats to them. We did not know but we might be meeting a future President of the United States, or a Martin Luther, or a John Wesley, or some other great and good man who would shake the world with his eloquence and power for good. Most of these children are bright, and we found some very intelligent." The preachers held revival meetings in nearly every community they visited. Some of the people who attended had never heard a Gospel sermon, while others had not been to a service for many years, but all seemed anxious to attend. Some of the people walked twenty miles to hear a sermon.

Mr. L. B. Compton, a mountain preacher, has been carrying on a remarkable work of faith near Asheville, North Carolina. Mr. Compton was born and brought up in this mountain country, and never had the advantages of schooling. In his twentieth year he landed in Cincinnati, Ohio, and while walking the street at night he wandered into Rev. Sherord Beatty's Rescue Mission and was led to confess Christ. He led men to Christ on the street, in the jails, or at his work on the railroad. His testimony was clear, and many were led to Christ through his efforts.

The people always listened with great attention to the simple message which had been brought to them with such difficulty. Over three hundred and fifty confessed Christ, and two churches were organized and two little churches built.

After three years of labor in Cincinnati and other cities, he returned to western North Carolina, and began an evangelistic work which resulted in the salvation of hundreds. Seven years ago he came to Asheville, doing street-preaching among the poor and neglected. While engaged in personal work he and his wife decided that a Rescue Home should be established for the unfortunate girls of this city and surrounding country. Without the promise of support from any one he opened Faith Cottage, Rescue Home for girls. In two years another step of faith was taken, and a permanent Home was bought, with two acres of land, and necessary repairs were made previous to occupation. From the beginning of this work the public was puzzled, because there was no visible backing. Then Mr. Compton's heart became burdened for the homeless and destitute children of this mountain country, who were without a mother's love and a father's protection. After some time of working among these neglected ones, and taking several, placing them in responsible homes, he decided to give his life and time to the rescue of these dear little waifs. It was while considering this work that two destitute children were brought to his Rescue Home, and he made it known to the public that God had called him to act as a father to the fatherless children of the mountains.

Mr. Compton then proceeded without any human backing to buy property and build a home for orphan children. The only encouragement was faith in God who loves the homeless, and a real desire to be a father to these helpless little ones. Nine acres of land with a small cabin on it was purchased, and a plan was soon given for the erection of the present building. Mr. Compton, with a few men who had offered to donate their services, proceeded to excavate for the foundation, and as he was well known in this section the people were surprised, knowing he had no money for such a building. His reply was: "I believe the Lord will send the money to the home." So this orphanage is the direct result of faith and works.

Eliadia Orphanage is located on one of the most beautiful spots in "the Land of the Sky," about four miles west of Asheville. In the distance can be seen the towering mountains, Biltmore, Vanderbilt's mansion, and the beautiful city of Asheville. The object of this Home is to give the children a good Christian education, and prepare them for a life of usefulness. The boys are given the advantage of some trade or profession, and the girls taught in domestic science. This Home was erected last year, and can accommodate about sixty children, but some improvements must be made before this number can be received.

Mr. Compton and his helpers live a life of faith, and give their services without salary. He turns every cent he receives from his evangelistic labors, except his traveling expenses, to the support of these Homes. This property is not deeded to Mr. Compton nor his wife, but to the unfortunate girls and destitute children as their homes, held in trust by trustees. The children received in this institution are legally bound until twenty-one years of age. The work was incorporated October 30, 1906, and is carried on in a business-like manner.

The books show that while the building was being erected the means week by week came in to meet the need, many times not until the last day and hour, to pay the carpenters. But Eliadia Orphanage and Faith Rescue Home stand as monuments of God's love to the fatherless and homeless.

The Doubter at School

TEXT—II. Tim. 3:7

"Ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth"

THE people here referred to lived in Ephesus nineteen hundred years ago. They are characterized by Paul as "men of corrupt minds." Yet they were learners; and this certainly was to their credit, since "wisdom is the principal thing." It was also to their praise that they were "ever learning;" for there is indeed no end to the possibilities of this quest. A tree, after growing for a while, reaches its maturity and grows no more; but not so with a man. His windows are always open toward the rising sun.

The fault of these Ephesians was that, while ever learning, they were "never able to come to the knowledge of the truth." They were like the horse in a treadmill that goes round and round and never arrives. They were perpetual pupils, always saying "I inquire!" and never "I believe!" They were always seeking and never finding; always learning and never knowing. "Take heed of such," says the apostle, "for they are reprobate concerning the faith."

An Age of Facts and Doubt

We need not go to Ephesus to find such people; they are nearer by. We are living in an Age of Facts. The world never knew so much as it does now. The man with the hammer has been chipping at the rocks for centuries; and the result is Geology, which is a bundle of facts. The man with the spade has been digging among the ruins of antiquity; and the result is Archaeology, which is also a bundle of facts. The man with the telescope has been watching the stars; and the result is Astronomy or star-ology, which is a vast array of facts expressed in mathematical terms. The man with the microscope has been scrutinizing vital atoms and the result is a science of Etiology, or facts respecting the origin of things. Thus an immense Cyclopaedia has been accumulated in the progress of the ages. If Plato or Aristotle were to return to the world he would find himself a mere abecedarian, unable to pass an examination for one of the advanced grades in our public schools.

And yet we are said to be living also in "an Age of Doubt." For the facts referred to lie within the province of natural science, that is, they are such as can be apprehended and verified by the physical senses; but the great world of truth which lies beyond the horizon of the physical senses is still an open field of inquiry. And here is where doubt prevails. It is easy to believe the things that we can handle with our hands and see with our eyes; but far less so to accept those which are attested only by faith, that is, "the evidence of things not seen."

Phases of Unbelief

The result is Agnosticism, which is a broad synonym for infidelity. The man who confines his investigations to the narrow province of physical things is sure to find sooner or later, as Charles Darwin did, that his power to apprehend spiritual truth has become atrophied by disuse. Unbelief is simply crystallized doubt. The man who keeps on saying "I do not know," is morally certain to reach a point where he insists "I cannot know;" and thenceforth the world of the Unseen and Eternal is an unknown land to him. This is the intellectual state against which Cowper makes his well-known apostrophe to Common Sense:

Defend me, therefore, Common Sense, say I,
From reveries so airy; from the toil
Of dropping buckets into empty wells,
And growing old in drawing nothing up.

This condition is due, first, to the absence of any real desire to know. For there is a vital difference between the love of learning and the love of knowledge; or between the love of study and the love of truth. It is like the difference between a sportsman and a pot-hunter. The former goes forth with a complete outfit, a corduroy suit, guides, decoys, a camping kit, and a breech-loading gun with smokeless powder. He is hunting for the sport of it. The other is a rustic fellow with an old-fashioned musket over his arm; he cares for nothing but to bag the game. So the genuine truth-seeker cares less for the pleasure of the quest than for truth itself. He is bent upon resolving his doubts because his life depends upon it.

A second reason for the mental arrest referred to, is the lack of a starting point. Archimedes said that he could lift the world if he could only find a pou sto, or place to put the fulcrum of his lever. The man who has no pou sto can lift nothing. The beginning of the search for facts is one fact well in hand. He who cannot say that he believes in God, immortality, revelation, or any other cardinal truth is in a desperate case, since he has no postulates. If one were to undertake to master Geometry without accepting the axioms he would never get beyond the fifth proposition of the first book of Euclid; he would always be working at some such simple statement as, "A straight line is the shortest distance between two points." A cobbler's apprentice is wiser than that; for he begins his trade by learning how to wax a thread and split a bristle; and having mastered that, he never goes back to the waxed-end. The secret of wealth is in getting a little and adding to it. It is a true saying, "To him that hath shall be given, but from him that hath not, shall be taken away even that which he hath."

The Lack of Standards

And another cause of this crass scepticism is a lack of standards. The perpetual pupil, like the spider, spins his thread out of his inner consciousness because he has nothing else to go by. He has no test or criteria apart from the Infallible Ego. If a salesman were to measure off your dress goods at random, you would be likely to ask, "Where is your yardstick?" And if he answers, "We don't use the yardstick in this establishment; we guess at it," you would go somewhere else for your goods. So are the children of this world wiser in their generation than the children of light. How can we determine as to spiritual truth if we have nothing to measure by? A skipper who sails without chart or compass carries no cargoes into any port. If a man says, like Theodore Parker, "I am not prepared to accept that statement upon the authority of any such person as God," and in consequence finds himself at sea respecting the great verities, whom but himself shall he blame for it?

And still another and most important cause of spiritual uncertainty is the neglect of faith. For faith is the only faculty by which we are able to discern spiritual things. The basis of Comte's philosophy of Positivism is thus stated: "The classification of the Sciences rests on the general principle that the nearer any department of study comes to the practical concerns of life the more removed is it from the possibility of precise knowledge." This proposition he illustrates by the fact that our knowledge of the solar system can be better expressed in positive terms than that of our nervous system. And this is true. It is a hopeless task, therefore, to undertake to demonstrate any spiritual truth by the scientific method. "Spiritual things are spiritually discerned." To insist on verifying the doctrine of Immortality, for example, by the evidence of the physical senses is as preposterous as it would be to insist on seeing with one's ears or hearing with one's eyes. As men, made in God's likeness, we are endowed with a sixth sense, to wit, Faith, in order that we may be able to perceive spiritual things, or, as Kepler said, "To think God's thoughts after him."

Doctor Chalmers, while discoursing in the General Assembly of Scotland on the Importance of Religious Truth as related to Science, was called to task by a fellow minister who said, "Doctor, did you not yourself once write a scientific book on The Magnitudes?" To which he replied, "Yes, more's the pity! For in that book I omitted the two greatest of magnitudes; namely, Time and Eternity."

Getting Right with God

We are naturally prone to listen to the testimony of the five senses as to things material, rather than to the evidence adduced by faith as to things unseen and eternal. On a dark night in the Castle of Erfurt, Luther awoke Melancthon, saying, "Philip, do you hear the nightingale?" "No," said Philip, "I hear no nightingale. I hear a thousand frogs croaking in the swamp near by." "But listen again, Philip; surely you can hear a nightingale, singing softly through it all." The physical senses speak to us thus, with voices loud and clear, but faith has a still small voice; and only they can hear it who go apart, like Elijah, and bend low with their faces between their knees.

We have considered the causes of this abnormal state of mental arrest and uncertainty respecting the truths that make for our eternal life; it remains to consider the remedy for it. If we find ourselves so habituated to doubt as to have become practically agnostics or unbelievers, what are we to do?

The first thing to do is to form a right conception of Truth. Truth is the principal thing. Truth is more precious than fine gold; it is of more value than rubies. Truth is to be valued not only for its own sake, but also for what it will do. Truth is power; it has in it the making of character and usefulness and eternal life. To belittle the value of truth is to doom ourselves to ignorance. Alas for the man who, like Pilate or finding himself in the very presence of Truth, lifts his eyebrows and asks derisively, "What is it?"

The owllet Atheism,
Sailing on unclean wings across the noon
Drops his blue-fringed lids and holds them close
And hoots at the glorious sun in heaven,
Cries out, Where is it?

The second thing to do is to get right with God. I once wished to make myself familiar with the Platonic philosophy he would betake himself to records of the Academy by the banks of the Ilyssus and ask for the writings of Plato, who knew all about it. God is the source and centre of spiritual truth, wherefore the truth-seeker would do well at the outset to get right with him. This means prayer, or communion with God. And once in his presence, the right attitude of the truth-seeker is that of absolute docility; as Jesus said "Verily I say unto you, except ye become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter the kingdom of heaven."

Practising the Truth

And thirdly, to be successful in this sacred quest we must proceed "Line upon line, precept upon precept here a little and there a little." As soon as one has mastered one truth, such as the being of God, or immortality, let him, as Lyman Beecher used to say, "nail that down." So far as that point is concerned, it is settled and beyond controversy, and this becomes a starting point from which to proceed to the acquisition of further truth. One of the wise things that Lincoln said was this, "When I get an idea I bound it east, west, north and south, and lay it by for further use."

And fourthly, having gotten somewhat of truth in hand, it behooves us to practise it. The fact that two and two make four finds its real value when the boy who has learned that lesson grows up and puts the dollar mark before it. A creed on parchment is nil; a creed applied means life and character. It is better to own a small corner-lot than to be a penniless dealer in real estate. The secret of right living is, as the Nonesuch Professor says, "to bring the bottom of one's life up to the top of one's light." This is but another way of putting Christ's word, "He that doeth my will shall know the doctrine."

A signpost at the cross-roads said to a willow near by, "Behold how wise I am; I point travelers to the city." To which the willow replied, "No doubt you know more about the way than I do, but during the years while we have stood together I have observed that, though you point travelers to the city, you have yourself gone no nearer than I, who know nothing about it."

The Disciples' Attitude

And finally, it is important that the truth-seeker should ever "follow on to know." His mind should be kept open to all new and better light. And the possibilities are immeasurable. Oh the universe of truth! The far vistas that stretch before us! This vastness of things unlearned and possible to be learned should make us humbly conscious of our ignorance. The man who comes to our city and rides about in a vehicle bearing the legend, "Seeing New York," returns to his country home with a feeling of satisfaction that he has so thoroughly canvassed the place, while an old Knickerbocker who has lived here all his life says, modestly, "I seem to know little or nothing about it." So says the earnest truth-seeker:

All things I thought I knew; but now confess
The more I know I know, I know the less.

We call ourselves "disciples," that is, pupils. It is a great and honorable name. As we venture forth further and further into the illimitable realms of truth, it is important that we should have a guide and a map of the country. Our Guide is the competent One, who said "I am the Truth." Our map is the Scriptures, of which he said, "Search them; for in them ye think ye have eternal life; and these are they which testify of me." And thus we venture forth; our Guide holding us by the right hand, and our left hand holding the Word of God.

And our prayer is ever for more light. "Open the windows," said Goethe on his death-bed; "let in more light." And more light there shall be, more and more forever; until faith is lost in sight and hope in fruition. Now we know in part and see through a glass darkly; but in the blessed realm of truth immeasurable we shall know even as we are known, and see face to face and eye to eye.

* Preached at the Marble Collegiate Church, New York.

WITH THE "PINK ROSE" CHOIR

WITH budding roses of delicate pink pinned to the white waists of the young women and to the black lapels of the coats of the men, the Pink Rose Choir of several hundred singers made an unusually effective picture as they faced the great audience at the meeting held in Reading, Pa., recently, in aid of the Beulah Anchorage. Besides the singers there were prominent clergymen and evangelists on the platform, and from New York City had come Mrs. E. M. Whittemore, the founder of the original Door of Hope, whose fame has spread far and wide, and has led to the founding of many other Doors of Hope for fallen girls throughout the country. The large and handsome auditorium was far too small to hold all the people who endeavored to gain admittance. Every seat was taken, and there must have been nearly three thousand present.

Roses were everywhere. Pink roses they were, of all shades, from those almost merging into red to those with but a faint flush upon otherwise snowy petals. Not only were they worn by the members of the volunteer chorus choir and by the ushers, but the majority of the audience also soon had the pink blossoms pinned to waist or coat, for young women connected with the Beulah Anchorage passed up and down the aisles acting as flower girls and selling the blossoms to the audience. The roses seemed to preach a sermon in themselves to all who were present, and prepared them for the touching story that was to come from the lips of Mrs. Whittemore. First came a service of song that was greatly enjoyed. The choir had been especially drilled for evangelistic services and was composed of the best voices in Reading. Both the chorus and solo parts were nicely rendered. The hymn, "A Song of Victory," was inspiring, and "The Diadem," sung with Welsh notes, was a novel feature that was greatly appreciated.

As the last notes died away Pastor G. D. Batdorf advanced to the front of the platform and asked all to bring their roses to the table at the close of the meeting to be gathered in baskets for the sick. When Mrs. Whittemore rose to speak she must have felt that she was indeed in the house of her friends, so warm was the welcome she received, and so great the interest manifested in the message she had brought. Mrs. Whittemore is a woman who has devoted her life to good works. It is a life that has undoubtedly brought great happiness to Mrs. Whittemore, for her face beamed with pleasure as she looked over her audience. She was dressed in a blue suit of military fashion. On the collar was the capital "S" of the Salvation Army, and on each shoulder shone the shoulder-straps of an adjutant of the Salvation Army. She did not wear the usual poke bonnet, however. Mrs. Whittemore, some years after founding her Door of Hope mission in New York, was taken seriously ill. The thought came to her, "Who will carry on my work if I should not recover?" She decided that she would arrange to connect her work with that of the Salvation Army. Later she herself joined its ranks, but she is entirely independent in the management of the home, and the other Doors of Hope, though all in union with the parent mission, are entirely independent of the Army.

In a clear voice that carried to all parts of the hall, she told the story of the Pink Rose, which has become the emblem of the Door of Hope, and the emblem of a regenerated life, a regenerated heart and a regenerated soul to thousands of young women who had given up the struggle against sin and seemed bereft of all that seemed sacred in womanhood. It is an old story to the speaker, but she makes it ever new.

Mrs. Whittemore and a band of Christian workers were making a Gospel tour of the slums on the East Side one night. Just before they started from home she had been given a beautiful pink rose. In prayer they asked that the fragrant blossom might be the means of bringing some one into the better life, and that God's blessing might go with the rose. The little party went into a crowded sub-cellar on Mulberry Street where a gang of thieves had their headquarters. They were at once accosted by the leader and spokesman of the gang, a young woman known to her companions as the "Blue Bird." She followed them out and went with them on their round. They found out afterward that she did this to protect them, as she was known to all the evil-doers of the district. Mrs. Whittemore urged her to come to Christ, but apparently no impression could be made. At last she left them promising to come to the mission the next night, and to her the rose was given. A day or two later, when Mrs. Whittemore entered the mission, one of the matrons placed in her hand a crumpled rose. The "Blue Bird" had come to enter on a new life. From day to day she grew in Christian character until she became one of the most effective missionaries in the slums. After a year of Christian service, in which she led many of her former associates to Christ, the former "Blue Bird" was called home, but in the lives of hundreds who were influenced by her toward better things, her memory still lived. Her funeral was attended by scores of outcasts who came to see for the last time their loved friend. All this was the result of Christian kindness and a pink rose prayerfully dedicated to the service of the Master. The pathetic story and the singing of the Pink Rose Choir will not soon be forgotten by the Christian people of Reading.

foreign chairs and a foreign brass bedstead. The latter was placed close against the wall, and instead of a mattress, had simply the bamboo bottom. Across the top of the outer side was stretched a piece of handsome silk embroidery, like a valance. The coverings of the bed were on it, but were tightly rolled, and, with the bamboo pillow, were laid against the wall. No matter how elegant these coverings are, they are never spread over the bed when it is not in use, so a Chinese bed has always a bare and unmade look. There was an ebony stand in the room, and across the front of it hung a table-apron of satin embroidered in dragon design.

After we had admired everything and the Tai-tai had made excuses for everything (this being quite correct form), I, having seen enough of Chinese society to know that the more questions one asks the better, inquired the purpose of the beautiful lacquered boxes that on one side of the room were piled almost to the ceiling. I suspected their use, but needed an opening wedge; and when the Tai-tai said they contained her wearing apparel, it was only polite for me to say that I should be delighted to see some of the robes. Indeed, it would have been remiss not to have shown that interest. The only thought of a Chinese hostess is to gratify and please her guests. In a second, almost, garment after garment was being lifted from its case and displayed to our admiring eyes, while Madame's own almond-shaped eyes danced with delight at our appreciation of the rare brocades and satins. The costume consists of an upper garment or jacket and lower one or skirt, below which the silken trousers are visible. The skirt and jacket do not correspond in color or material, but the shades, which at first glance seem incongruous, blend harmoniously. A dress intended for calls in official circles had considerable gold braiding on it, and Madame showed us the amethyst and jade hair ornaments and beads intended to wear with this costume. Many of the jackets were lined with rich furs, and the entire outfit showed the refined artistic taste of its owner.

A Chinese visit begins and ends with apologies, and the Tai-tai regretted that her house was not in better condition for our visit, saying they had moved so often recently that they had not been able to have it permanently decorated. She also told us that, including children and servants, there were thirty persons under her roof. I afterward learned, through Miss Emily S. Hartwell, a personal friend of the Tai-tai, that the reason Taotai Lu's family has changed residence so often is owing to his rapid promotion. He was sub-prefect, then prefect, and is now Mandarin at the head of the Telegraph Department of the Foreign Board.

Tai-tai Lu is the most advanced of the wives in the official set at Foochow and shows considerable independence. She is a frequent visitor at the foreign consulates and recently, when calling upon Mrs. Gracey, wife of the United States Consul at Foochow, wore an all white, brocaded upper garment.

"Of course," acknowledged Madame Lu, in referring to this incident, "very few Chinese women would have done it. In China," she explained, "white is used for mourning; but I am not at all superstitious about it, and since I like the foreign fashion of wearing all white, why should I not adopt it? It is so cool and pleasing."

Through the influence of Mrs. Gracey, Madame has unbound her feet and has induced all the women of her household to do the same.

When we took our leave, the Tai-tai accompanied us as far as the court entrance to the house, and again interlacing her slender fingers, said in Chinese, "Walk away slowly," which is the polite equivalent for "Don't hurry."

The Taotai of Hupek Province, who is at the head of the railways, is having his children taught English by the first girl graduate of Foochow College. It was this official who opened the Boy's Industrial Reform School at Foochow, the first provision made by Government for industrial education of this class of boys. The school is situated in the oldest and most noted monastery in the city. Several gigantic idols, some thirty or forty feet high, still remain in the court, showing its former use.

Delighted With the Red Letter Bible

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I received your Red Letter Bible. This makes the fifth teacher's Bible that we have in our home. I have been trying for a long time to get a small portable Bible—a pocket Bible—but whenever I found one that suited me in size the print was always too miserably small for my somewhat defective eyesight. But your Red Letter edition fills the bill exactly. It is small in size, light in weight, attractive in appearance, the print large and beautiful. The red lettering makes it especially attractive, with the Bible Readers' Aids, Concordance and Word-Book and Maps. It is a surprise to me how you managed to get so much between the two lids. Thank you a hundred times over for it.

Labor and the Church

EVERY thoughtful Christian must rejoice that there are evidences, in all our great cities, of the church at last concerning itself with the urgent problem of poverty. May the movement extend and embrace all creeds! It is not the business of any one denomination more than another, nor is any one more likely than another to succeed in solving it. So large and difficult a problem needs the combined wisdom of all, and every denomination should welcome co-operation and assistance from the others.

Every day the problem becomes more pressing, and the responsibility for relieving it greater. It is not the fact of business being more active or sluggish that is to be considered, but the sense of insecurity that constantly weighs on the workingman. The failure of his employer, a fire in the factory, a change in capricious fashion, or a hundred other possibilities may throw him out of work and bring him face to face with grim want. No man can enjoy life or make the best of it with such contingencies before him. It is useless to tell him that he should live well within his income and make provision for a rainy day. He knows, and his employer knows, the market value of his work and his weekly wage does not exceed that rate, which in few cases leaves any margin of income over expenditure, out of which provision for emergencies can be made. This is a continuous anxiety which becomes acute when, in such times as these, there is a tendency in many trades to restrict employment.

It may be contended that this is an economic problem, with which the Church has nothing to do. The fact that the Church has, to a large extent, taken that view accounts for the present alienation of the workingmen from its services. It is the main factor in his life, and if the Church holds aloof and takes no interest in it, the workingman realizes that he and the Church are traveling different ways. The Church, he holds, may settle for itself its problems of doctrine, of ritual, of church government in which it is immersed; he must apply himself to his own problem of getting bread for his family. So he stays at home on Sunday or attends a meeting of men in similar condition to himself, where they can discuss the matters in which they are interested.

Would not all this be changed if the Church put itself in line with the attitude of its divine Founder? His idea was a brotherhood of men, and he dwelt on this as emphatically as on the corresponding revelation of the Fatherhood of God. Cannot the Church consider this awful problem of poverty? Cannot it take it up and honestly strive to solve it? At least it may show sympathy with the sufferers, not so much in gifts—though in some cases these are needed—but in taking the hard pressed man by the hand, listening to his trouble and sincerely and intelligently seeking a way out of the difficulty. So may we bear one another's burden and thus fulfil the law of Christ.

Voting Out the Saloons

IT seems only a few years ago when the outlook for the triumph of temperance appeared discouraging, and even those who knew most about the movement and were working hardest for the suppression of the liquor traffic would say that it would probably be a generation or two before great gains could be counted.

To-day these same workers are watching with pleased astonishment one victory after another over the saloon. It is like a great snowball that has started at the top of a mountain. At first it had to be formed and pushed along, but gradually it gathered more snow unto itself, and then, of its own weight, rushed onward, growing in size with every foot it covered.

So it is with the temperance movement. It is gathering momentum and drawing to itself all of the respectable elements in many communities, and is sweeping everything before it.

It differs, however, from the snowball in this respect: it does not melt away no matter how fierce the heat of the attack made upon it. It is here to stay, and here to win. The liquor traffic is being beaten in all parts of the country. It has received its death-blow in the South, and knows it, though it is making futile efforts to appear alive in a few places. The Christian people in those districts may be depended upon to finish its existence, and its menace to manhood and to the homes of helpless women.

A short time ago there was chronicled upon this page the vigorous campaign in Canada and the stories of the temperance battles that were won. Hardly has the liquor traffic had a chance to think twice about how it could change its tactics and save itself elsewhere, than the thousands of voters of Illinois go to the polls and vote that the saloon has done enough harm in towns in that State. Not all of Illinois has "gone dry," but the list is an encouraging one.

There local option was voted upon in 1,150 of the 1,295 townships of the State. The temperance forces made gains in all of the country districts, with, perhaps, three exceptions. Some of the larger places voted for license, but the liquor majorities were greatly reduced.

It is reported that the women prayed while the men were at the polls, and when the vote was announced it was found that between 1,500 and 2,000 saloons had been voted out of existence. It shows what can be done with the ballot, if the respectable portion of any community would work together for the common good.

Turf Gamblers' Tactics

BY a tie vote of twenty-five to twenty-five, being one vote short of the majority required by the Constitution, the New York State Senate has defeated the bills forbidding gambling upon race-tracks throughout the State. It is only a temporary reverse, however, and should not discourage the many supporters of the proposed reform. It is in the power of the Governor, if he chooses, to summon an extra session of the legislature, at which, if the force of public opinion and the urgent recommendation of the State executive are of any value, the bills ought to pass. It is the duty of the Legislature to yield obedience to the mandate of the State Constitution, which declares that that body "shall pass appropriate laws" to carry out the purposes of the Constitutional provision forbidding "pool-selling, book-making or any other kind of gambling" in the State of New York.

It is, therefore, no exaggeration to say that the real battle has only begun. In both Houses, the struggle just closed was bitterly contested. But the gamblers were only fighting for time; they could foresee ultimate defeat. All the big and little betting magnates joined forces to defeat the reform, or, at least, "by hook or crook," render it inoperative before September 1, so that for one more summer they might continue to victimize the public. In the Assembly a victory was won for moral legislation and the result was due almost wholly to the skilful and vigorous anti-gambling crusade conducted by the press and the pulpit, and ably supported by a large body of sensible legislators. It was a campaign of education which enlightened the people in relation to the wholesale knavery and corruption of the turf gamblers. A tidal wave of popular indignation arose throughout the State, creating conditions which the law-makers at Albany could not ignore. Able speakers laid before the public convincing evidence of the evils of the betting system; they showed how cunning traps were laid for the unwary, how the rich spoils were gathered by the betting fraternity, and how thousands of lives were blighted and promising careers wrecked by the system which is a disgrace to a civilized community.

Through the failure of the Senate to pass the bills, the gamblers may now enjoy a brief season of triumph in which they will continue to act in defiance of the State Constitution, which prohibits public gambling. Inflated by their victory, they will doubtless consider themselves secure. But it is a time for the friends of public morals to work harder than ever, in order that victory may be assured in the next battle. Reforms are usually of slow development; but public sentiment is cumulative, and when it reaches the maximum stage it overwhelms all opposition. The anti-gambling campaign must be kept up and the people educated until the public conscience is quickened, when they may demand of their legislative representatives, as a right, the passage of the reform and the rooting out of turf gambling and its kindred abominations.

The Misuse of the Mails

IN the shortest message he has ever sent to Congress the President has directed attention to the need of legislation empowering the Postmaster-General to prohibit the use of the mails for the dissemination of anarchistic literature. He fortifies his message with an opinion from the Department of Justice, which holds that the Postmaster-General is justified in excluding any publication which counsels murder, arson, riot, or treason, or which contains any article that is of itself a seditious libel.

This latest contemplated official movement against anarchy is supported by the President in these words:

When compared with the suppression of anarchy, every other question sinks into insignificance. The Anarchist is the enemy of humanity, the enemy of all mankind, and his is a deeper degree of criminality than any other. No immigrant is allowed to come to our shores if he is an Anarchist, and no paper published here or abroad should be permitted circulation in this country if it propagates anarchistic crimes.

In its practical interpretation, the order will only exclude publications that are criminal and will not extend to the literature of political and social discussion. There is no purpose on the part of the government to erect a literary censorship, or to check free discussion; but the whole nation will approve its purpose in summarily halting the spread of such publications as represent the "militant doctrine" and advocate riot, assassination and the deadly bomb.

The Famine Cloud in India

SLOWLY but resistlessly the famine is spreading in India. Conditions which only a few months ago were limited to a portion of the United Provinces and Eastern Punjab, have extended to a much larger territory. On every hand the indications point to a great struggle with hunger within the next few months.

Mr. Benjamin Aitkin, editor of the Bombay Guardian and a well-known authority on affairs in India, who has had experience in former famines, a few days ago sent this cable message in response to an inquiry by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

BOMBAY, April 9.

DR. KLOPSCH, New York:

Number on relief works slowly rising. Now more than a million and half. The general distress is spreading.

This message significantly corroborates the letters of the missionaries. Their appeals for help are multiplying with a rapidity that must soon awaken the sympathies of the civilized world, unless a higher Power sends relief meanwhile.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

Britain's New Premier

THE resignation of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman as Prime Minister of Great Britain, owing to illness, has been followed inevitably by the appointment of Mr. Herbert Henry Asquith as his successor. No other choice was possible. He was prominent in the Liberal party that Bannerman made him Chancellor of the Exchequer—equivalent to Secretary of the Treasury—and during his own illness made him the representative of the Cabinet in Parliament. He therefore advised the King to appoint Mr. Asquith, which he has done.

The new Premier is fifty-six years of age and has been twenty-two years in Parliament. He had a distinguished career at Oxford University, winning the rare honor of a first place in two departments of study. As a barrister he made a conspicuous success, becoming a Queen's Counsel, with the privilege of wearing a silk gown in the law courts, at the comparatively early age of thirty-eight. He was elected to Parliament by a Scottish county, though he is not a Scotchman, and was cordially welcomed by Mr. Gladstone, then at the head of affairs. Mr. Gladstone gave him one of the most difficult places in his cabinet, that of Secretary for Home Affairs, and during the three years that he held office he won the esteem of his chief. Lord Rosebery, who succeeded Mr. Gladstone, had similar confidence in him, finding in him a man nearer to his own ideal than any other man in the party.

It is a difficult task that Mr. Asquith now undertakes. A clever critic of Parliamentary leaders writes of him: "I have a suspicion that he is simply incapable of an indiscretion. The party of all the enthusiasms is destined to be led by the man with none." He has undoubtedly more ability than Bannerman had and is more of a statesman, but he lacks Bannerman's fine tact that kept the heterogeneous elements of the Liberal party in good humor and held them in harmonious fraternity, a quality essential in a successful Premier. It is certain that the Labor members regard him as an aristocrat, and that the Irish members distrust him. He is also disliked by the rank and file outside Parliament as the author of a bill diminishing the number of saloons, while leaving unrestricted the privileges of the clubs, where the rich man can get all the intoxicants he wants. Nor has he won the good will of the Temperance party, who are indignant at his arranging to grant compensation to the men who are thrown out of business by the suppression of the saloons. He has, however, a strong majority in Parliament pledged to support Liberal measures, which, unless some unforeseen contingency occurs, he may retain for four years. Unhappily, he cannot count on their loyal support, for one section considers him too conservative, while another deems him too radical. All he can hope to do is to follow his own principles, trusting to God for guidance. Then it may be said of him, as of the ancient statesman in similar circumstances:

They could find none occasion nor fault: forasmuch as he was faithful, neither was there any error or fault found in him. (Daniel 6: 4.)

Another South Polar Exploration

An interesting series of experiments have been made on the Alps by Dr. Jean Charcot, the famous French explorer, who will start in August next on his expedition to reach the South Pole. He contemplates making a more extended use of the automobile than does Lieut. Shackleton, whose expedition for the same object was described in these pages on March 25. Dr. Charcot intends taking three motor-driven sledges to aid him in reaching the goal, and has been making a test of them in conditions resembling as nearly as possible those he expects to encounter in the Antarctic regions. A sledge has been driven to the summit of an Alpine mountain over the snow and ice abounding there, and descending thence to the valley. A sledge, driven by a twenty-four-horse-power motor, with a huge wide wheel, was found to answer the purpose more successfully than any other that was tested, and has been selected. It attained a speed of eight miles an hour in climbing the mountain and remained well under control at the same speed in descending. It is hoped by this means to overcome the difficulty which has hitherto proved insurmountable, both in Arctic and Antarctic expeditions, in crossing the ice which explorers call "hummocky." Dr. Charcot has been in close touch with Captain Scott, the leader of the 1901-1904 expedition, and has the benefit of his advice as to the necessary equipment of the party. He expects to remain two years in the Antarctic and has been undergoing all kinds of tests, both of person and machines, to meet the rigors that his expedition is likely to involve. His success, and perhaps the lives of himself and his companions, depend on the preparations he is making, so that he is wise in seeing that they are thorough. He hopes to enter a region never yet trodden by mortal man. To many men the region beyond the grave, which they must enter, is of that character, but they neglect the Book which is a sure guide and do not follow Him now who has promised them safety there.

Rt. Hon. H. H. Asquith

Being made perfect, he became the author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey him. (Heb. 5: 9.)

Speculation Suspended

A significant reason has been given by a veteran speculator on the cotton market for quitting the field of his operations for a period of two years. He announced publicly that he had closed out all of his cotton commitments, amounting to thousands of bales of the May option. He has also reinsured the business of a fire insurance company, and will liquidate that concern, the stock of which he controls. He has advertised the sale of his horses and carriages at public auction, and has decided to sell out the twelve thousand acres of land around his country home, which he has disposed of. This is all the more remarkable because he was supposed to be immersed in his business, and to have no interest that competed with it. There was some reason for his being proud of his achievements in that line, for it is not long ago that he paid millions of dollars in discharge of liabilities that he had incurred in connection with a firm in which he had an interest. It therefore astonished the market when he suddenly declared that he was going out of business for two years. He explained that his son, only three years old, on whom an operation was recently performed, is in a critical state of health. Specialists have expressed the opinion that his life may be saved and his constitution built up if he can have constant attention in such a climate as Maine, and afterwards on the French coast. The speculator declared that the health of his child was of more importance to him than money-making, so he is going to devote the next two years to undivided and unremitting attention to him. Seldom does a business man in his estimates put business second to anything. If he did, there would be more men who would follow our Lord's advice:

Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you. (Matt. 6: 33.)

A Judge's Thank-Offering

A boy was brought up in the Harlem Police Court, New York, one day last week, charged with having embezzled eighty dollars, the property of a business man in Philadelphia. Search had been made for him, and he had been traced to New York. The boy acknowledged his guilt, but told a pitiful story of poverty in his home. He had used some of the money to relieve the distress of his parents, and with the remainder had come to New York hoping to obtain employment. He had succeeded, he said, and if his former employer would show mercy he would work hard and repay him the money he had stolen. He was a bright boy, and his story struck every one in court as having the ring of truth. The magistrate was evidently impressed in his favor, and asked the complainant to give the boy a chance, but the man refused. It happened that the magistrate has a son of his own, who had been lying between life and death for several days from an attack of scarlet fever. That morning the crisis had been safely passed, and the father had come to court with his heart full of thankfulness that his boy would live. Looking at the boy in the dock, and thinking of his own boy that had been spared to him, he said: "You may go; I will settle with your employer. But see that you behave in your new place." That boy is now in a position to understand the mystery of vicarious suffering that puzzles many philosophers. He goes free, not for any merit of his own, but because of a father's love for another boy.

Even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you. (Eph. 4: 32.)

STRANGE HEATHEN TRIBES OF BURMA

THREE years ago a band of mountain Chinese living in the high mountains in this province visited Nan city. Three of the women came to a prayer-meeting and listened to the story of the raising of Lazarus. This was the beginning of our work among the "Yows," as these people are called by the Laos. For two years, when they came upon their annual trading expeditions to Nan, portions of the Scriptures were distributed to them, and when last March the head-man, with twenty of his stalwart sons and relatives, visited us, it was to thank us with deep emotion for the Gospel, and beg for more instruction and books.

The P'Yah Luang, as he is called, related how precious the Bible had become to him; how they were living where the spirits often made them afraid, and "when we gather around our camp-fires at night and read about Jesus," he said, "we can now sleep without fear."

Daily instruction was given to these people, and when they left us they carried back two hundred copies of the Gospels to give to their neighbors and friends. This P'Yah has about five thousand people under his control, and he tells us that their villages are scattered through all the great mountain chain reaching up into the interior.

A recently converted Chinese coming from the island of Hainan has shown a deep interest in the Yows, and he asked and obtained the privilege of carrying books and tracts to those living in remote regions. He does not speak their dialect, but they both can read the same Bible character, and he feels sure that God can use him to bring many souls to a knowledge of Jesus. One of our dispensary assistants accompanied him and will relieve the sick, of whom we hear of many needing help. If one or two good men can be found who will consent to study medicine at the mission hospital for two years, and take up the work of caring for their own sick, we shall be glad.

At the request of the P'Yah, a Christian teacher has been sent to instruct the young boys at his village in reading Laos. Next year we hope they will have enough knowledge to attend the mission school in the city, and eventually become evangelists to their own people.

Only one of these men has assured support, and we earnestly pray that God will put it into the hearts of some of his children to aid in this work, which is so evidently of his ordering. "He has set before us an open door and no man can shut it."

Your letter was a direct answer to many prayers and in full faith I have sent out four men, and will keep them at work until I can hear from you, for the work is most gloriously encouraging. One man writes that he found twenty-two persons driven out, accused of witchcraft, who welcomed him with joy, and began the study of the Scriptures, fully determining to become Christians. There is no doubt but the mountain people (called Yows), will accept Christ as their Saviour, as a tribe, but they should be fully instructed, and that will require months of labor among them. We expect much fruit from the labors of "Dok Mi," the Chinese, who is now among them.

The church elder, Nan Pun Yah, was most unjustly imprisoned for six months, but the Lord gave him thirty souls while in jail, and the jailor himself has become a Christian. I have the manacles worn by Nan Pun Yah, bound with ribbons and hung in our drawingroom. His conduct under persecution has exalted him in the eyes of the whole community.

[The three remarkable illustrations above are reproduced from drawings by a native Buddhist ex-priest of Burma, which have been forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by the missionaries at Nan. Together the three pictures form a series portraying incidents in the legendary pilgrimage of Buddha. In the first, Buddha is ascending a mountain, wishing to be alone for meditation; but he is pursued by a man-eating demon or genie. Buddha never hastens, yet the pursuer cannot overtake him, being held back by spiritual influence. In the second, Buddha, having reached the summit, seats himself under a tree, still undisturbed by the presence of the demon. The latter, overcome, throws away his weapon, and worships Buddha, who is wholly unobservant of his proceedings, being absorbed in prayer and contemplation. In the third picture, the powers of nature, animate and inanimate, are seen serving Buddha; the white elephant brings him water, and the monkey, honey and fruit, which he gratefully accepts. Such are some of the peculiar legends attaching to Buddhism in Burma.]

A RACE FOR LIFE IN ALASKAN WILDS

By J. H. ROMIG, M.D., Nushagak, Alaska

LATE in May of this year, and well up to the head of the Kuskokwim River, two miners were coming down from the icy streams that wash the yellow metal from these undefiled deposits of Alaska's frozen banks. They had had an unsuccessful prospecting tour. They had found good indications, but the money of the trip was all gone and no provisions were to be had. Then toward the lower reaches of the river they had turned their faces, where food could be secured. In the mountains they could stay no longer. The dead-lock on travel had just been removed by the bursting of the rivers from their icy fetters, and to drop down the river was a pleasant matter, compared to the many laborious days spent in ascending, when nothing but the hope of great success could spur man to the dangers and perils of such ventures.

Partly satisfied with the trip, they were ready now to return. One day was spent in making the land trip to the main river, which, by the aid of the dogs, could be done by each packing a load. The dogs were accustomed to this; but being under-fed at this time of the year, they felt the weight more than if food had been plentiful. Prospectors may quarrel and separate, but one true friend never leaves them, and that is the dog. Whether food be plentiful or scarce, he is ever at his master's side to do his part, carry his loads, or draw the sledges; and if he cannot go in the boat, if it is summer, he runs on the bank and swims the icy streams if he can but be with his master at camp.

Disappointed in the hope of gold, and without money or provision, the two partners and the dogs had camped on the bank of the river, and were now breaking camp in the morning, preparatory to leaving for the coast. By an unexpected mishap, one man accidentally shot the other through the leg. The bullet shattered the bones into many pieces. A few other prospectors camped near by came to the aid of the distressed pair. The nearest doctor was about 800 miles distant, with an ice-bound coast between. Men of the wilderness do things when they need to be done, and do not lose much time in preparation. The limb was secured as best they knew how, and the trip begun with much haste. The oars fell heavily, as the boat moved from shore. Some things must be left, and among them the dogs, which, as was their custom, ran along the bank, howling, as the boat disappeared from their sight. No food was left in camp and none could be had in the forest, and their only friends were leaving them in the boat. The sick man required too much room to take the dogs in the skiff, though to leave them was distressing, even to the suffering master. Presently the decision was reached and the boat swung to shore. The dogs were mercifully shot.

On the second day of the race for life, to the joy of both, a steamer was sighted. She was tied to the bank and taking on wood for the trip down stream.

The friendly captain took them on board. A few days more and the steamer would be at the upper mission station where word could be had of the doctor. Finally the cheering news came to the sufferer: "the mission is in sight," and though the doctor was absent the kindest skill and care of the missionaries were expended for the injured man. But he must go to the hospital, and so, from one boat to another and from one mission to another, the poor sufferer traveled until the coast was reached. A schooner in winter quarters was soon put in readiness, and though two weeks had elapsed since the accident, the race for life was still urged on energetically.

Then followed a dreary experience of storms and fog and the crossing of flats and rolling in the trough of the sea, with misery and discomfort too lengthy to relate. Not until a week after taking the schooner did they dare to round the cape, and then the heavy fogs bespoke ice near by. The wind decided them to take their course for the Nushagak, but it died out before they rounded Cape Constantine, only to come up in a southeaster with a tide drifting shoreward. Their position became most critical as the gale increased and the anchors began to drag. To avoid stranding on the shallows, the sails were set, the chains slipped and the craft headed straight for the cape. Soon a heavy bump was felt and the seas rolling over the deck told them they were near land. Presently the ebbing tide left them on dry land. Few had thought of anything but their lives. It was found that the terrible pounding of the little schooner had loosened the dressings on the injured limb, and added cruelty to his sufferings.

They were wrecked forty miles from the hospital. The captain and another man started out to get help, and in forty-eight hours were at the hospital, footsore and hungry, but thankful to the people who had helped them on the way. Supt. Berglund, of the Alaska Fishermen's Packing Co., placed his steamer at their disposal for the rescue, and in twenty-four hours more the injured man was brought to the hospital. He was almost in a dying condition, for blood-poisoning had apparently set in. His temperature was 104. At the operation, a captain who was present said, "Why torture him further? It would be as well to dig one grave for all of the man as for part of him."

A few days after the operation, when he had strength enough to speak, the sick man said, "I am a countryman of Carnegie, but I have not his wealth. If I cannot pay you missionaries for saving my life the Lord will repay you, and if any of my claims turn out, I hope to do so myself." This man is still with us, well, but crippled. We have applied the $20 THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers sent us on his account, and we assure you that your wish that God might bless the gift, the distributor and the beneficiaries, has already had its fulfillment, and we trust that the blessing of the Lord may be the portion of the benevolent giver also.

AROUND THE HOME HEARTH

About Wedding Anniversaries

IT may be convenient to some of my readers to have a complete list of the successive wedding anniversaries which may properly be celebrated, and to which friends may be invited. They are as follows: First year, cotton; second year, paper; third year, leather; fifth year, wooden; seventh year, woolen; tenth year, tin; twelfth year, china; fifteenth year, crystal; twentieth year, linen; twenty-fifth year, silver; fiftieth year, golden, and sixtieth year, diamond.

The fortunate few who arrive at the diamond wedding must have been wise enough to marry early, and naturally diamond weddings are rare events. It is often, however, our great pleasure to chronicle a golden wedding, and recently the golden weddings of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers have seemed to give good promise that some of the venerable brides and grooms will celebrate the later and more resplendent anniversary. Silver weddings are very common, and so are those that signalize other halcyon periods in married life. Whenever it is possible, a married pair should break the bondage of routine by a celebration of the different home anniversaries. Birthdays should always be fête days, and wedding days should not be passed over in forgetful silence. If only a family dinner is possible, with friends and relatives present; if only a somewhat larger gathering of the clans can be managed, then take the wedding anniversary as an opportunity for thus cementing kindred love. In the earlier anniversaries, a reunion of the friends who were present at the marriage of the happy pair is in order, and, although it is never good form to indicate a desire for gifts, still gifts are always welcome as tokens of good will, and the list given shows what form the gifts may take.

Many inquiries have been received from correspondents lately with regard to refreshments at wedding anniversaries. There should be no difficulty in deciding about a menu, if the hostess can be satisfied to serve her guests as they sit about the rooms or at small tables placed here and there. When people are invited to sit down to a regular meal, such as dinner or supper served in several courses, a good deal of trouble and expense are involved. An informal luncheon need not burden the mind of the housekeeper. Delicate sandwiches may be prepared in great variety, or the hostess may be satisfied with one kind only. The crust should be cut from the bread, which should be buttered on the loaf and very thinly sliced, and the filling may be of minced ham or chicken, of lettuce with mayonnaise dressing, of cream cheese, jam, peanut butter or anything else that the lady of the house chooses to provide. Sandwiches, chicken salad and coffee, or cake and lemonade with ice cream or without, tea and bread and butter with sweet biscuits and bonbons, almost anything, in fact, that is easy to prepare and may be daintily served, will answer the purpose.

In serving guests who are seated around the room, it is customary first to supply each with a plate and napkin. After this, whatever is to be eaten may be served, and tea, coffee or lemonade should follow last. A prettily set central table in the dining-room or in a back parlor is always an attractive feature, and if tea, coffee or chocolate form part of the bill of fare the daughters of the house or their girl friends will always be happy to pour and hand the cups to other young friends who are pleased to act as waitresses or waiters. Many a young hostess hesitates to have company because the serving of refreshments seems to her rather formidable. In reality, nothing is simpler, if one does not make it too great a burden.

At a wedding anniversary, the rooms having been decorated with flowers, the receiving party should form in line near the door of the living room or parlor. If the reception is large, rooms may be provided where gentlemen and ladies respectively may lay off their outer wraps. If small and informal, wraps may be left in the hall. The husband and wife, with sons and daughters, if these are young people, or with brothers and sisters or some of the attendants at their wedding, stand in line to receive the congratulations of guests. When the guests have all assembled, the host and hostess mingle freely with them, passing from group to group. Conversation and a little music, and at a silver or golden wedding, a short address from the minister, if desired, agreeably fill the time. The effort should be to have everything as informal as possible. If gifts are brought, it is always in order to place them where they can be seen and admired.

A Bit of News from Finland

Her name is Muna Sillanmaa, and she is an active and useful member of the Diet of Finland, elected to her seat largely by the suffrages of the servant maids of her district. This bit of news would indicate that Socialism in Finland is making a practical advance

THE BREAKFAST

BREAKFAST will never taste any better than it does to-day to this happy little brother and sister. Older people look back to childhood and talk about the bread and cake that mother used to make, forgetting the zest of the childish appetite. What pleasure to run barefoot in the fields on a summer morning, untrammelled by shoes and stockings, with a glad day before you for work and play! Blessings on the children who are eating their mid-day lunch with relish, sitting close together without a fear for the future. They look as if they had just said a prayer to Him who gives the world its daily bread.

along lines that none who value good order as opposed to anarchy can safely criticize. Why should not domestic servants be represented in government by some one of their own class or of their own choice, just as any other set of people might be? Friction between employers and employed in the domestic realm, and everywhere else, will never cease until people know and understand one another. Most of the grievances about which so much talk is heard in this country might be remedied by common sense and kindness. If only we can let the light in anywhere on any trouble, if only we can learn how to bear one another's burdens, a new day will dawn for labor and capital. One does not need to believe altogether in equal suffrage, to concede that the influence of a sensible, level-headed woman, who knows what she wants and what her constituents want, must be felt for good. Therefore, this bit of news from Finland is on the whole interesting as a straw that points the movement of the tide.

Wearing Out or Rusting Out

"I WOULD rather wear out than rust out," is an observation frequently on the lips of conscientious people who are trying to do all they can at home and in society, to fill a measure of usefulness. The measure, of course, depends on the man and on the woman. There are those whose capacity is merely that of a pint or a quart, while others measure up to a peck or a bushel. For the amount we can do as dependent on our original capacity we are not responsible. As of old, to-day God gives to one a single talent, to another five, and to another ten. We are answerable for the use we make of the ability and the opportunities God gives us. But there is something false in the common saying that it is better to wear out than to rust out.

Why should we do either? To crowd three days' work into one, and to do this deliberately day in and day out, to spend the energy that was meant to last until old age in a few brief years, if it be done with deliberation, is to commit an act of reckless folly. In reading the obituaries of several excellent men who have passed away before they had reached old age, the conviction has been forced on the mind that they have undertaken and carried on far too many enterprises. One man cannot be president of this and vice-president of that, and director of the other, a treasurer here, a secretary there, an office bearer in the church, the principal of a school, a good husband, a good father and a good friend, and keep on carrying every responsibility connected with the manifold duties of his life, without taxing too much heart and brain and body and soul. The man wears out too soon. There has been exacted of him an amount of labor that the fine machine given him by the Creator for use, not abuse, could not endure. Ministers, with their multiform obligations to the individual parish and the larger church organization, are especially apt to wear out and reach middle life with impaired vitality. Teachers do it constantly, and cannot well help themselves. Physicians and business men in the tremendous pace of American life, editors and authors, and certainly housekeepers and mothers, need a caution about this temptation. The exceptional man or woman in our country is willing to rust. Something in our climate, something in our stimulating air, something in the example set us by our fellows, early starts us on that double-quick pace that means inevitably wearing out. We should do better work, be more amiable, easier to live with and very much stronger both physically and mentally, if we made it a rule not unnecessarily to wear out ourselves and not to exact an over amount of service from others.

We are glad to publish this contribution from an old-time reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

Mother's Heaven

All love and joy and peace my home will be. What consolation to know we have heaven to be thankful for! Whatever sorrows bereave us, whatever irredeemable errors darken our lives, we can still trust in the Lord and wait patiently for him in the little that remains. Beyond the loss or gain of this life, high in the serene air of heaven, where existence ceases to be a lesson and becomes vivid life, there and only there will be given us our heart's desire in its immortal fulness. Here knowledge is defiled, love imperfect, purity the result of fiery trial, but in heaven is the very native country of pure knowledge, perfect love, utter sinlessness and riches which moth and rust cannot corrupt, which bless and curse not.

—ANNE PAGE. Kissing games are out of fashion, except occasionally at birthday parties of little children.

—TO HOUSEKEEPERS. Desired an exchange. Mrs. B. W. Brough, ton, Centre Road Station, Pennsylvania, would like to receive from some reader of this page a recipe for a delicious old-fashioned cake, although called training-day gingerbread. She will send in return a good recipe of her own. Aunt Prudence would not mind having this recipe herself, as she used to eat this gingerbread in her childhood, and well remembers how good it used to taste when coming in hungry after school.

OUR readers will recall that in our last issue we requested them to co-operate with us in enlarging our subscription list, and submitted to them some very attractive propositions in the way of inducement and reward. We then stated that May 5th was the very last date on which subscriptions secured in response to that appeal could be mailed.

In nearly every instance, heretofore, we have accommodated tardy subscribers, accepting subscriptions under similar offers after the time limit had expired, but in this instance we CANNOT UNDER ANY CIRCUMSTANCES accept any subscription mailed later than MAY 5th on the favorable terms published in our last week's issue.

Subscribers who contemplate earning some of the exceptionally liberal rewards offered in last week's issue should therefore remember this warning and get their subscriptions in before it is too late.

MAY 5th IS THE LAST DATE for mailing under the propositions contained in last week's paper.

IN THE KAMCHATKA MISSION

By CYRUS TOWNSEND BRADY

THESE had fallen to Winnington the hardest of all the missionary allotments of the great church to which he belonged. The Kamchatka mission comprised the coldest, least, loneliest, forlornest territory in the world. There was a little fringe of settlements on the two thousand miles of seashore included in its metes and bounds. The discovery of precious metals had filled these settlements with a heterogeneous population in which the bad of all races predominated. Religion there was face to face with the grimmest materialism. It needed a man of Winnington's high purpose, heroic courage and logged persistence to fight the battle of the White Christ in the white land of eternal snow. The affair was further complicated by the wretched native races, driven from the seashore lest they be exterminated there by the white man's races, who clung to the banks of the great inland rivers, to whom also he must minister.

He faced the situation practically single-handed, for the church had not rallied to his support as it might have done, as it should have done. Tirelessly he traversed the magnificent distance which separated his few scattered stations; by boat in the short summer when the sounds and rivers were open, or with dogs and sledges over the snow in the longer seasons of cold. In Arctic day and Arctic night alike he went resolutely about that great business of his Father's which came to him with an irresistible appeal. As much as could be that of any human man his heart was wholly in his work.

Yet not all. As we are compounded of body and soul, material and immaterial; as there is in all of us a singular mixture of sense and spirit, so his thoughts and affections, on the long and lonely journeys in what but for him sometimes seemed an empty world, went back to the United States—to a woman. Winnington was still a young man when he was called to the Kamchatka mission. It was a hard thing for him to leave his former sphere of work, to give up all that it held for him of future usefulness and brilliant service, and to go out to the blasted country which was henceforth to be his home. Harder still than the parish to leave behind him was the woman who tugged at his heart-strings perpetually over three thousand leagues of tossing sea and broken shore.

Charlotte Anstead had refused positively to accompany him. He had loved her; they had been engaged to be married when the call to the Kamchatka mission came to him. Charlotte Anstead, a bright, pleasure-loving, happy young woman, who represented the best and the richest of the social life of the community in which he had worked so successfully, had no mind whatever to bury herself in Arctic wild either for the service of God or for the love of man, although she was quite willing to serve the One and love the other within reasonable limits. Forgetful was she of the fact that true service and true love alike are unconditioned.

Winnington had not pleaded with her to accompany him. He loved her as he loved the summertime in winter; he longed for her as in the darkness of the Arctic night he craved even the pale sun of the Arctic dawn. Like the great, the brave man that he truly was, he loved once, but that once was forever. Yet he had not urged her to go with him! All the pleading had come from her. When the news of his election had fallen from the clear sky of their pleasant life with the suddenness of the proverbial bolt from the blue, it was she who had exhausted every woman's argument to induce him to decline the task and to remain where he was, with her, where such preferment opened before him as should satisfy the greatest ambition, ambition she deftly pointed out for the doing of service incalculable to the cause he loved.

Winnington's conscience, his ordination vows, would not permit him to decline the preferred honor of practical martyrdom which had been, as it were, thrust upon him. He quite understood the feelings that raged in Charlotte's bosom, the tempest of passionate resentment and rebellion which his passive acceptance of the conditions raised in her soul. His eyes were opened even to the love the woman had for him. Yet to Kamchatka he would go.

Winnington had been a timid man with women, somewhat shy even toward her he loved. He had been content with Winnington's church, her soul had never received the fire touch, no Flaming Tongue of Holy Spirit had ever whispered to her heart the unspeakable joys of self-sacrifice and renunciation. She could not, she would not go; and Winnington's quiet, resolute, unbreakable determination to accept the call, even though it involved separation not merely from all his material prospects, but from all his earthly hopes of happiness, finally angered her. She was jealous of that power from whose allegiance she could not shake him. With a marvelous courage she had unfolded her soul to him, she had shown him undreamed-of depths, unimagined treasures of affection, which might be his for the taking. She had watched him and wiled him, swayed him and bent him, almost she had broken him,

"Yet your affection had a measure," said the Bishop quietly little outward and visible sign. He had asked for few demonstrations of affection during the engagement. And to find the glorious creature that he loved trembling in his arms, her lips pressed to his own, her heart beating against his breast, shook him until he could scarcely control himself. The courtship had been a leisurely one, an old-fashioned one if you will, marked by reverence which shrank from familiarity on the part of the man and a somewhat easy acquiescence in the situation on the part of the woman. He knew the depth of his own passion, but she had never realized hers until she looked upon him, as it were, vanishing from her sight.

In her struggle she was aided and abetted by all the family influence. They were not unwilling to have her marry the brilliant young minister with such a future as seemed to open before him, but they strongly objected to her going to Kamchatka with him to subject herself—with all her love of the petty luxuries of life, which are not so petty after all to those who have been born and bred to them—to the horrible hardships of loneliness and separation in that frightful country.

While Charlotte was a member of Winnington's church, her soul had never received the fire touch, no Flaming Tongue of Holy Spirit had ever whispered to her heart the unspeakable joys of self-sacrifice and renunciation. She could not, she would not go; and Winnington's quiet, resolute, unbreakable determination to accept the call, even though it involved separation not merely from all his material prospects, but from all his earthly hopes of happiness, finally angered her. She was jealous of that power from whose allegiance she could not shake him. With a marvelous courage she had unfolded her soul to him, she had shown him undreamed-of depths, unimagined treasures of affection, which might be his for the taking. She had watched him and wiled him, swayed him and bent him, almost she had broken him, but she had not moved him. And so, fancying that she was not the stuff out of which the martyr is made, she had turned her back upon him and he had gone forth alone. The ship that bore him westward had scarcely left the distant shore when she wrote to him. No, not offering to come to him, not changing her decision, but compelled thereto by the intensity of a passion which the resistance of the period which had elapsed between his appointment and departure had developed to an extent which amazed and frightened her so that she scarcely recognized herself. And in her secret heart appraising herself at her full value and conscious of her every charm—indeed, he at least had made no secret of their power in his parting words—she began to admire the man that he could resist her. She began to feel something of the fine and high spirit of him who, humbly following in the footsteps of a Greater than man, counted the world lost that he might save men. Her own passion enabled her to fathom the renunciation of him whom she had sent to Kamchatka on a cross alone.

And yet at first she did not abate one jot of her resolution. Her pride intervened. She would write to him. She would let him know by the burning tenderness of letters that glowed like tropic suns amid the Arctic snows in which he lived, what he had missed and what was still waiting for him. And so she poured out her heart to him with a frankness as unusual as it was extreme under the circumstances; and he—he knew and understood. He told her simply what those letters were to him. And she loved to picture him at night, some dim oil lamp casting a faint irradiance within the hut of wood or house of snow, holding in his gloved hands worn letters which he read and read and read—

The Kamchatka mail was very infrequent, and sometimes many days elapsed before her communications reached him. A letter might be eight months old before he received it. And yet such was the potency and power of its passion that it appealed to his heart with all the freshness of an instantly spoken word. His heart ached for her, yet as she had failed to shake him in her arms, she had not broken him in her letters.

Rich, young, beautiful, she had no lack of suitors. She was not a recluse. By an entirely natural tendency she plunged more feverishly into the social whirl of the world in which she lived than she had before his departure. But no one touched her heart. She remained constant to the brave man battling so far away. She was not chary of her companionship. She gave her friendship freely, but she had no power of disposal over her affections.

He had been twenty-four when he went out to Kamchatka, and she a few years younger. He was thirty now. He had gone forth in the flush of youth and strength and vigor. Hardship, anxiety, disappointment had written their signatures across his brow; tinges of gray were in his hair, lines of care in his face; there was a firmer set to his mouth, a slight stoop to his shoulders worn down by Atlantean burdens; but his eye was still bright, his heart was still high and his courage was still great. The succeeding years might dim the eye as the preceding had whitened the hair and bent the shoulders, but nothing could change that heart and his courage. His the unalterable determination of the hero.

She had no picture of him except the one he had left behind when he went away. There were no photographers in Kamchatka. And, although he had been earnestly invited to return on vacation by the authorities of his church, he had stayed the six years at his post of duty. She had exacted from him by dint of questions something of the change wrought in him. And on one or two occasions she had fallen in with travelers returning from that land who had told her more than he would ever have dreamed of disclosing.

On the other hand time had wrought little change in her, he thought, as he looked upon her picture. She sent him one every year. It was the last that he always wore next to his heart. Little miniatures on ivory or porcelain which the great stark man handled as reverently as if they had been the souls of children, which were the only adornments that lightened the grim log walls of the rude cabin he called his home in the principal settlement on the Okhotsk littoral. Her obstinacy had perhaps tightened the lines of her lips a little, but the face he longed for looked at him from each successive picture with all the smiling happiness of youth and love. Her love was a very sacred thing to him. He never discussed it with any one. The pictures were not on view. The men of the camps had the run of the cabin except the little room in which he

THE FILIPINO "FISH FESTIVAL"

By ELIZABETH W. JANSEN

WE know that the editors and readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are hard at work for many parts of God's sorrowing world, and that they are not forgetful of the Isles of the Sea. We know how to appreciate our coming means of reaching waiting, longing people, and thank you and your fellow helpers earnestly for all your efforts for the Mission Boat which is now on the way to Cebu.

For the past month we have waited for a native boat to take us out to live in the southern villages and towns. For three weeks we have waited, packed up ready to start. Two days ago the news was brought to us that the native boat which was to bring us was under repair, having been found to be rotten and too risky for our lives and belongings to be trusted to.

These Christians in our distant islands have waited our return a long time. They will praise God and pray to him to reward you and all your readers when the Mission Boat El Heraldo Cristiano arrives. We hire a launch now and go on Monday morning early to our waiting village friends.

I am sending you a photograph of a native festival. These Cebuans are waiting for their idols to be brought out of the church. When the idols are carried out, the people form in procession, and go through the streets following these silent images. They mumble prayers to their saints as they walk along, and any Filipino who stands with his hat on as the procession goes by, or any woman who does not kneel, is made to suffer for it.

The church from which the idols are being carried out is perhaps one of the most noted in the history of Romanism in Cebu. Some fifty years ago a story was invented about the Lord Jesus having once visited this church. The story, long accepted by many, is as follows: In the afternoon, when it was about time to think of buying fish for supper, a priest, who was in the church, espied a little boy. He was dressed in the very scanty garments of the poor boys of the tropics. The priest, weary from his devotions, and hungry likewise, ordered the boy to go out and buy him some fish for his supper. The boy, who was ordered to "buy a good fish and to get back quick," never returned! The priest, shocked that a Cebu boy should have so little respect for the man who represented the power of the church, determined to instruct his parents strongly on this point. But the next morning, on entering the church, the priest saw a vision. The church was hung with fish, which were suspended in festoons from its high roof. Then, so the story goes, the priest understood that he had ordered the boy Christ to purchase fish for his supper.

Owing to this strange story, an annual feast day is set apart in this church district of the city for the worship of "the Christ boy" who hung the church with fish. That part of the city was well chosen, for it is where most of the island fishermen live. This miracle and some others equally wonderful, as well as many processions from this church of St. Nicholas, make it a well-known religious centre.

Strangely enough, the first Protestant missionaries to the Southern Philippine Islands settled in this very district, and the first converts—evangelists and Bible women—came from there. The priests of this church had the Bibles burned and the missionaries and converts stoned, and they are still eager in every way to hinder the spread of the Gospel. Yet the Word of God is gaining ground in more hearts and lives every day. There is need of more evangelists to answer the pleas of hundreds of new seekers, north and south and east and west. The spiritual need of the island becomes more and more pressing month by month.

[The Gospel Mission Boat El Heraldo Cristiano is now on the way to Cebu and should reach its destination a few weeks hence. Contributions for its equipment and for the balance of the purchase money are still needed. Readers who are interested in the advancement of the Gospel in the Philippines, can greatly aid with their contributions in putting the Mission Boat in working order. It should be a free gift to the missionaries, given in the Master's name. It will be of immense advantage to the workers in that strange "Parish of One Hundred Islands" where so much of the travel is necessarily by sea. These journeys have been made up to the present time in little native boats, a slow and dangerous method of traveling, and one which has been a great barrier to missionary progress. All contributions should be addressed "Mission Boat, care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD," New York.]

CHRISTIANITY AND LABOR

A GREAT light shines upon the questions of capital and labor, when viewed in the white light of Christ's life and his Gospel. Jesus said, "I beheld Satan fallen as lightning from heaven." Thenceforward, and to this day, the burden and bitterness of life and toil have been slowly falling from man.

The awful bitterness of Roman slavery was gradually lessened and finally passed away; the bloody scenes of the arena came to an end as the spirit of Christ's rule began to take possession of the world. There was every promise that the lot of man in a brief space of time would pass from the darkness and misery that so long had covered the earth.

After the first centuries, the advance seemed slow. Then came the discovery of the art of printing, and the Bible, the Magna Charta of the human race, began to be scattered broadcast. From that time man's condition showed more rapid advance. It is but little more than a century ago that the church awoke to the fulness of the truth that God "would have all men to be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth." From that hour until the present, the church has been sending forth, in ever-increasing numbers, her messengers east, west, north and south.

At about the same time when this great awakening took place, the Spirit of God inspired men to discover and apply the power of steam, and to invent labor-saving machines which in ten thousand ways have lightened the burden of toil. It is manifestly the purpose of the Father of all that as men receive the Gospel of his Son, they shall have opportunity to enjoy that new life in the world that now is as well as in the world which is to come. We believe that the machine, the power of steam, and that mysterious force we call electricity are for man, and to lighten his labor. If this were not the case, and these forces were to be under the complete control of a few, there would be but one end—the lot of the toiler would be utterly hopeless.

This can not be, as the world is ever moving forward. Meantime men must be patient, capital with labor, labor with capital. Each is doing its part toward the better time, not far distant. Our journey onward may at present be as through a narrow mountain pass; but at the end lies a land of fair fields and running streams. The cloud over us has a silver lining. Were it not for the life and teaching of Jesus, we would stand hopeless before the sphinx question of capital and labor. Human society will yet be moulded after the pattern of the teaching of the Carpenter's Son. Both capital and labor, nay, all men everywhere, must come to realize that "these sayings of mine" are the decisions of the Supreme Court of the world. The mountain stream in its flow downward separates the great rocks; so Christianity has already divided much asunder. Right and wrong are growing further apart. To do right because it is right alone, is an ascending principle. What men must ask is: "What is right? What would the Master have me to do?"

REV. EDWARD LOVE.

IN THE KAMCHATKA MISSION

slept, from whose walls her eyes looked down upon him, as with the light turned out he lay awake and dreamed dreams of her.

He knew that those dreams would never come true. One of the reasons he had not gone back was because he could not bear to face her again. Her letters told him that she would use the old arguments, this time with the added power of an experience of life without her which he would find it more difficult to resist.

Well was it for him that the work engrossed him, that it grew and grew, that it presented itself in such a way to him that it needed all his strength and all his consecration and all the spiritual help that he could get to accomplish it. Although he loved her no less, yet in his replies to her letters she could discern with the exquisite intuition of devoted womanhood that the conditions of life had become settled for him; that he had finally acquiesced in her decision, and that henceforth she was to have no personal touch with his career. The bitterness of that conclusion sometimes blinded her. She felt as if she could have gone to him uninvited now simply to show him that he was wrong. But pride held her back until one day something happened.

Among the high officials of the church to which they both belonged was a man distantly related to Charlotte's family. Good fortune brought him to her father's house for a visit. Everybody loved Charlotte, and the old man quickly fell under her sway. One thing led to another, and presently he had her entire confidence. When she had told him her story, he had something to say in turn. He disclosed to her what was known to no one outside of the governing body; namely, that he and his assessors had decided that Winnington had served long enough in the Kamchatka mission, and that they intended to transfer him to one of the more agreeable and promising fields in the United States. They had, said the Bishop, no desire to see such valuable material as Winnington utterly broken down and wasted away in the Kamchatka mission. Other men would be found to take up the work, and Winnington should have the rest he had earned. The old man smiled benignly upon Charlotte as he spoke. He opined that Winnington would have something else that he earned when he came back to the United States.

Charlotte's heart leaped in her bosom; her soul burned as she listened to the Bishop's words. She could not sustain the keen glance of the old man which seemed to read the recesses of her being. She hid her face in her hands; her body rocked softly to and fro. He was coming back; he would be hers. She had not given up; she had shown herself as resolute as he. And now she would have him after all. The years of waiting fled away. She remembered that last hour when she clung to him, when his lips were warm upon her own. The color like a wave flooded her face which had been white in the sudden shock of the tidings. She dropped her hands and looked at her friend.

"Do you love him so much?" asked the Bishop compassionately.

"So much?" half laughed the girl, looking at him with swimming eyes, "I cannot tell you how much I love him!"

The Bishop looked at her gravely.

"Yet your affection had a measure," he said quietly at last.

"A measure?" asked Charlotte swiftly. "This," returned the Bishop, pointing to the elegance and luxury of the surroundings. "This was its measure as opposed to the lonely log cabin in the Kamchatka snow."

"Yes," said the girl quickly, the flush in her cheeks deepening, "it was a measure once, but it isn't a measure now."

"Do you say that," asked the old man, "because he is coming back?"

"Because it is true. I am sure that any time in the last few years if he had asked me to come to him, I should have gone."

The problem of uniting safety with certainty of legitimate and profitable earnings is a serious one to the thrifty wage-earner. The Industrial Savings and Loan Co., whose offer appears on page 345, will help you to solve it right.

Use cold cream if you want to. It has its value.

But to clean the skin, you must use soap: pure soap: Ivory Soap.

Never mind if it does cost only a few cents a cake. It is infinitely purer than most soaps that sell for five times its price.

Use a soft cloth and hot water—to open the pores, allowing dust and dirt to make their way out. Dip the cloth into the water and rub on it some Ivory Soap. Souse the skin well for almost or quite five minutes. Rinse with cold water; cold water closes the pores and makes the skin firm.

There is no "free" (uncombined) alkali in Ivory Soap. That is why it will not injure the finest fabric or the most delicate skin.

sion, "the way," had a fixed and well understood religious meaning. It meant a path uniting two worlds, the seen and the unseen, earth and heaven.

One day last summer a father, mother, brothers and sisters, started for a long country ramble, but Fanny, the eldest girl, was not ready to start off with them, and was to follow. Directions were left with her which road to take. At last she started, and for a time there was no difficulty in following the others; but after a little she came to a place where two roads met. She had now to stand and think; but the more she thought, the more difficult it seemed to decide. Both roads stretched out into the sunshine; both led into the country; but which was the right way?—which would lead to the father's side? As she stood puzzled and wondering, her eye rested on the sandy path, and there, written in round, childish hand, were the words, "Fanny, this is the way." All doubt was at an end; she simply believed the written message, obeyed, and followed, and soon had the joy of reaching those "gone before," and learnt that her little sister had lingered behind to write those words on the sandy road.

The Royal Road

We need never have any doubt about the way to heaven, for Jesus has said, "I am the way." We have only to follow him in all that we do and say. "One of the interesting things connected with the Klondike gold excitement is the preparation made to build houses to be sent from New York to Alaska in sections to be put up in the gold-camps. Vessels are loaded with these ready-made houses in New York harbor, and sent around Cape Horn, thus reaching Alaska in time for the opening of navigation on the Yukon at the beginning of summer. That is the way we must do in going to heaven, in regard to a house of character for the soul. It is idle for us to suppose we shall enjoy heaven unless we cultivate the heavenly spirit here."

When Jesus said, "I am the way," he was using an expression clearly understood by Orientals. Not only did the Hebrews have definite ideas of "a way" from the manner in which the fathers had been led from Egypt to the Promised Land, but they, and others also, knew of the roads and the ways which had been prepared by the Romans; also by the Egyptians. There was a road built by Seti, the father of Rameses II., known as the Royal or Pharaonic Road, leading into Syria. Semiramis, the queen of Babylon, built a road through Media, and afterward through Persia. In ancient Persia, Darius the King built a royal road from Susa to Sardis. In the days of Moses there was a road known as the King's way, and permission had to be sought of the king to pass over it. But there were roads for the people, leading to the six cities of refuge, which were most beneficent in their purpose (Deut. 19: 1-3).

Seeing "Face to Face"

"Passing through the narrow alley of a city the other day, we heard a woman's voice in cheering song. The words of the refrain upon which she lingered seemed strangely out of place in that environment. She sang:

"And I shall see him face to face,
And tell the story. Saved by grace."

Looking up toward the place from whence the song came, we saw a poor old servant woman, down on her hands and knees, scrubbing a second-story floor of a dwelling. In a moment that sweet song took a depth and beauty of meaning and a charm unimagined before. That poor scrubwoman, in her weary toil, was a 'daughter of the King,' an heir of eternal glory, for a short time away from home, a pilgrim and stranger in the earth. What she sang as she looked up into the face of the Unseen, was sober truth. 'I shall see him face to face.'

"The drudgery shall cease. The rags shall drop off the old body. The prisoned spirit shall be set free. The dust and smoke and din of this weary world shall vanish out of sight. New scenes shall open to the unveiled eyes, even a world which needs no light of moon or star or sun, for the "Lamb is the light thereof." It is worth while to tarry and toil and suffer here for a little while, to live for Jesus in a world that "lieth in the wicked one," with the faith and hope of that better time in the heart. As Whittier wrote:

I know not what the future hath
Of marvel or surprise,
Assured alone that life and death
His mercy underlies.

And so beside the Silent Sea
I wait the muffled oar;
No harm from him can come to me
On ocean or on shore.

I know not where his islands lift
Their fringed palms in air;
I only know I cannot drift
Beyond his love and care.

Save the Homes

IN a recent address, the Rev. Johnston Myers, of Chicago, Ill., made this eloquent plea for the American home:

The happiness of a city depends upon its homes. Yet beyond a question these oases in our human life are in danger. Wife abandonment has increased one hundred per cent. in Chicago in three years. In 1902 there were 557 deserted wives who applied to the county for aid. In 1905 there were 939. Divorce has increased throughout the country over seventy per cent. in seven years. Think of this vast array of ruined homes. Then add to this number the homes which are rent by family quarrels and robbed of their support by the liquor traffic and you can see the pitiable destruction of American homes which is now in progress. From these broken, wretched homes goes the largest number of the patrons of the saloon. They produce boy bandits. They fill prisons with criminals old and young. In so-called higher circles of society the drug fiends and the dissipated weaklings are the result of bad home influences and bad training. "Is there anything going on at the church to-night?" asked a boy of one of our wealthier families. "Why not go home?" he was asked in reply. "Mother is at the theatre and father has gone somewhere and I will not stay with the servants," was his answer. In almost every case our great strong characters in church and state have been the product of good homes. Their parents may have been poor, but the home was made attractive. If you save the homes we will have little use for reformatories and juvenile courts. There will be less and less occasion for places of refuge. Some relative will care for the bereaved ones. Save the homes and fewer of our young men and women will care to spend the evenings in questionable places and degrading amusements.

Nothing is so attractive and enjoyable to the human heart as a real home. A gentleman recently accosted a clerk whom he knew, who was running to catch a car. "What is your hurry?" "Going home," was the reply. "Any one sick?" "No," was the answer. "I just want to get there, that is all." Save the homes if you would bring most enduring happiness to the largest number of people.

How can this be done? It can best be accomplished by sending into all of these family circles trained, experienced, lovable Christian women. They win the confidence of the family. They are fitted to find out the difficulties, to advise, to comfort, to make brave and patient those who are sorely tried. They can minister to the needs whether these be caused by poverty, bad habits or some misunderstanding. Many homes need only a loving friend. This refined Christian woman is fitted to be such a friend.

Increase the number of these competent visitors and the homeless ones will not wander about our streets. The boy will be corrected, not in the courts, but in his own home. He does not need a good judge and a court room, but a good mother and a happy home. There are questions of hygiene, clothing, house-keeping which can all be arranged without humiliating any one. Hundreds of instances might be given where these women by their kind, Christian ministries, have saved the State an additional burden and saved several human lives from last- ing disaster.

COFFEE EYES

It Acts Slowly but Frequently Produces Blindness

The curious effect of slow daily poisoning and the gradual building in of disease as a result, is shown in numbers of cases where the eyes are affected by coffee.

A case in point will illustrate:
A lady in Oswego, Mont., experienced a slow but sure disease settling upon her eyes in the form of increasing weakness and shooting pains, with wavy, dancing lines of light, so vivid that nothing else could be seen for minutes at a time.

She says:
"This gradual failure of sight alarmed me and I naturally began a very earnest quest for the cause. About this time I was told that coffee poisoning sometimes took that form, and while I didn't believe that coffee was the cause of my trouble, I concluded to quit it and see."

"I took up Postum Food Coffee in spite of the jokes of husband, whose experience with one cup at a neighbor's was unsatisfactory. Well, I made Postum strictly according to directions, boiling it a little longer, because of our high altitude. The result was charming. I have now used Postum in place of coffee for about three months and my eyes are well, never paining me or showing any weakness. I know to a certainty that the cause of the trouble was coffee and the remedy was in quitting it and building up the nervous system on Postum, for that was absolutely the only change I made in diet, and I took no medicine."

"My nursing baby has been kept in a perfectly healthy state since I have used Postum."

"Mr. —, a friend, discarded coffee and took on Postum to see if he could be rid of his dyspepsia and frequent headaches. The change produced a most remarkable improvement quickly."

"There's a Reason." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Scientist Koch Visits Us

PROFESSOR ROBERT KOCH, whose investigations in bacteriology have won him world-wide fame as a scientist, arrived in New York from Germany on April 7, accompanied by his wife. He was met at the Quarantine Station by a committee from the German Medical Society of New York, among them Dr. Carl Beck, the President; Dr. Herman Fischer, Dr. Joseph Gleitsmann, Dr. George Heimrond, of the Rockefeller Institute, and Dr. Alfred Meyer, of Mount Sinai Hospital.

Dr. Koch will visit Buffalo, Chicago, St. Louis and San Francisco, and intends to go to Japan. His trip is in the nature of a health vacation. He has been to Africa five times on scientific expeditions and suffered considerably from the climate. On several of these journeys he was accompanied by Mrs. Koch. Their last eight months in Africa were spent on an island in Lake Victoria Nyanza, where Mrs. Koch was taken ill and had to go to the coast to recuperate. While on the island, the professor investigated the "sleeping sickness," which has created such havoc in the German and British colonies in Africa. As a result of these studies, he prepared his remedy, "atoxile," which is claimed to be the only known cure for the disease. While they were there 1,000 blacks died from the malady, which attacked whites and blacks alike. Two English surgeons died, and several other white men who were there investigating the disease in the cause of science. The first stage of the disease produces great excitement, the second insanity, followed by a comatose condition that lasts for several days and ends in the death of the sufferer. The deadly germ of the "sleeping sickness" is carried from one village to another. The cause of all the infection is believed to be a fly, called by naturalists the "Glossina Palpalis," which preys on crocodiles and hippopotami. It is found in swarms on the banks of the rivers and lakes in Africa.

Additional interest attaches to Professor Koch's visit in view of the recent gift of a large sum by Mr. Andrew Carnegie for the purpose of aiding the scientist in his investigations, especially those that relate to the causes and cure of consumption. His discovery of the bacilli of phthisis in 1890 was one of the notable scientific events of the century.

Dr. Koch was born in Hanover in 1843, and was educated at Gottingen. He has held many appointments of distinction, among them being these: Member of the German Imperial Board of Health, Privy Councillor, Director of German Cholera Commission, Professor in Berlin University, Director of the Institute of Hygiene and Director of the Institute for Infectious Diseases. He was decorated with the Order of Merit several years ago. He is active and vigorous, gray-haired and gray-bearded, with kindly blue eyes that twinkle through gold-rimmed spectacles.

During his stay in New York he inspected a number of the city hospitals. On his way home from Japan, via the Suez Canal, he will devote some time to the study of the bubonic plague in India, and its contagion through rats.

Young People's Societies

Clouds Lined with Silver*

UNDER the many promises of the Old Testament to the good man of immunity from affliction and special protection, there runs a thread of admission that trouble might come for a definite purpose. The whole book of Job is full of that teaching. He was so good a man that his worst enemy could find no fault in him. That trouble so crushing and so distressing should fall upon him was a mystery. The book explained why it had come, and it must have been a consolation to many an afflicted soul. The righteous man groaning under trial, and having to bear the suggestion of Pharisaic friends that he examine himself to discover what sin he could have committed to bring such judgment upon him, could point to that book as proof that God might have some higher motive than punishment in afflicting him. Who can tell how often the book may have served this purpose!

Isaiah, too, has a similar message of an infinitely higher significance. That significance was not perceived for many a century, and until the fulfilment came the Jew had before his mind a literal meaning full of consolation. The beloved of the Lord, the righteous servant, bruised and beaten with many stripes, not for any sin of his own, but for the sins of his people. How that conception must have comforted the oppressed and the exile, who could not understand why God did not interfere for him! If he could only believe that God was not angry with him, but was using him as he used Job to fulfil his purposes, what a relief it would be! He would gladly, cheerfully suffer in such a cause. If he could be assured that it was not in caprice, not in anger that he was afflicted, the cloud would indeed have a silver lining, and he would rejoice in chastisement that only proved his sonship.

* Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society for May 3. Ps. 42; Ps. 43.

Kept in Peace*

WHAT a wonderful secret that must be in this world of trial and sorrow, that could keep a man undisturbed in affliction! It is so much the common lot that there is no house in which it is not found, no soul among all the thousands that we see on the street that is not in some shape under sorrow and anxiety. If there is any secret that will keep a man cheerful under his griefs, how many would crave to know it! It is this that Isaiah contends is within the reach of the godly man. "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee, because he trusteth in thee." It is the figure of a man in a lighthouse who is perfectly assured of the strength of the building as the storm raves around him. But it is more than that. It is the figure of a man lashed by storms, who knows that there is within him a life that will survive though his body perish. Paul has this in mind when he speaks of "the peace which passeth all understanding" (Phil. 4: 7).

When a man in a time of quietness looks forward he is apt to feel himself safe if he has a comfortable provision for himself and family, when his health is good and his conscience untroubled. He is at peace, and the peace is within his understanding. His investments he believes to be secure, and he has made arrangements by insurance to meet all contingencies that may arise. His peace has a basis in his understanding. But it is conceivable that some trouble that he has never foreseen may come upon him which sweeps away all his refuges. Then he needs the peace that passes all understanding. This may come to him in the faith that is above and beyond his own provisions. The assurance that no matter what comes he is safe in the knowledge that "all things work together for good to them that love God."

* Topic of the Epworth League for May 3. "How to Be Untroubled in Trouble." Ps. 125: 1; Prov. 16: 7; Isa. 26: 3; John 14: 27.

An Imperial Poet

BY HIS MAJESTY THE EMPEROR OF NIPPON

MELTING into dream-mists—golden with the gold of the sun,
Speeds the path that the child may know by the name of the Study-way.
And to the tender feet which wander down the path—
(Ah, let them learn, ere it be too late),
No greater foe is than the whisper tempting says:
"Ease, my child, loiter awhile."

Echoes, once silken as a velvet dream, are shrieking:
Silence thunders.
'Tis the voice of victory speaking.
Amid the tumult that lords o'er land and o'er the sea
When victory speaks,
Let them take heed, my men of arms:
The time of watchfulness be with them
When victory speaks.

The Promised Refuge

By Mrs. M. Baxter

OUR blessed Lord does not mock us when he says, "Let not your heart be troubled." He shows us the way out of all our troubles: "Ye believe in God, believe also in me." When he commands us to "be careful for nothing," he tells us how this is possible. "In everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your request be made known unto God." When he tells us to cast all our care upon him, he also tells us "he careth for you." What does this mean? Just this—that he who "bare our sins in his own body on the tree" (I. et. 2: 24), and made himself responsible for them, bears also all our burdens, and that not in a sentimental way, but really, practically undertakes them, takes the tangled skein in his own hand and unravels it, deals, in his Almightiness, with impossibilities, and make them possible.

"Believe also in me." "Believe that I care for you, and so rejoice, let your prayer and supplication be 'with thanksgiving,' because the troubles are passed over into my hands, and I take the charge of them and of you." "Believe in me—that I make that business of yours my own, as soon as you drop the care of it into my hands; that that husband, and that family, and that weak body are my charge, and that I make them my field of labor, as soon as you believe in me, and give me credit for doing what I say; and, therefore, let not your heart be troubled." A troubled heart is always in unbelieving heart. How can we be sad when all power and all love has undertaken our case, and it is being carried through by God? Believing in him, we rest in the midst of trouble; because the burden is upon another.

"In my Father's house are many mansions [abiding places, R.V.] . . . I go to prepare a place for you." Oh, what in anticipation for the future! What a precious consolation for the present! He who makes us his home tells us he is preparing our home. Room in heaven, and every place there prepared for the coming occupant! What a home feeling it gives one! As population increases selfishness increases too; the struggle to live becomes desperate, and the desolate thought on the heart of thousands is, "There is no room for me." There are plenty of workmen, but too few situations for them; plenty of willing hands, but not enough work for them to do. In every department of life there is the same story, "No room for you." Oh how glorious to go out of an overcrowded world to the place of many mansions! And it is just like the heart of God to make such a provision. There is an abiding place yonder for every one of his children, and room enough for all. Oh, it is so blessed to know that even now, even here, we have a hearty, glad welcome from our Father whenever we go to him on any errand. It is his joy to receive and to bless us.

Jesus said, "Whither I go ye know, and the way ye know." Thomas demurred to this; he had not learned the lesson which Jesus had again and again taught—that he must die and be raised again the third day. He said, "We know not whither thou goest, and how can we know the way?" Thomas did not understand his answer, "I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life; no man cometh unto the Father, but by me. If ye had known me, ye should have known my Father also, and from henceforth ye know him and have seen him." "I am the Way"—how that simplifies everything! Jesus is the Way to the Father; Jesus is the Way to salvation, to sanctification, to healing, to happiness, to power, to unity among brethren, to the hearts of sinners—the Way to everything but sin. He is "the Truth"; whatever there is of truth is only Christ himself; and he is "the Life"—life for soul and body, "the Resurrection and the Life."

If we try to make our own way of holiness, or of usefulness, or of power, our hearts will be troubled, we shall be full of anxiety which comes from our taking upon ourselves the part which Jesus claims as his. If we demand of ourselves truth or life, and are disappointed that we do not come up to our own expectations of what we ought to be, our hearts are troubled; we are not at home. It is because we do not really believe in Jesus on this point, and we are counting on ourselves instead of him. "No man cometh unto the Father but by me." The reason why so many prayers are unanswered is, that many, in the secret of their hearts, come to God independently of Jesus. They may use the words, "For Christ's sake," but there is a feeling underneath that they have some right to approach God. They are conscious of their own earnestness, of their own need, of the purity of their own intentions, of their own devotion to God—but, in all this, there is no dependence on Jesus.

Better Off Without Saloons

KANSAS CITY, Kan., a city of almost one hundred thousand population, is the largest prohibition city in the United States. It has been represented that the town has "gone bankrupt" since the saloons were ordered out, that business has been ruined, and that people are moving away. "Nothing could be farther from the truth. Leading business men and bankers of Kansas City, Kan., declare that business was never better than now. Miss Farrow, city treasurer of Kansas City, said to the writer that there had never been more cash in the city treasury than now; all judgments have been paid and the city employees are paid in cash instead of scrip, as heretofore. The income of the city is just as large, despite the fact that hundreds of saloons or joints have been closed. C. L. Brokaw, cashier of the largest bank in Kansas City, Kansas, has employed from his own resources a corps of stenographers to reply to questions about prohibition features in Kansas City. John W. Briedenthal, a prominent banker and politician, says the business and professional men are aroused at the statements sent broadcast by brewery interests, that Kansas City is suffering in a business way because of the saloons being closed. "Business was never better," is the general sentiment of every business man in the Kansas town. The laboring man, as well as the business man, is realizing that the city is far better off without liquor stores.

I Am the Paint Man

2 Full Gallons Free to Try—3 Months Time to Pay

You Pay No Freight To Try My Paint

I AM The Paint Man. I have a new way of manufacturing and selling House Paint.

It's unique—it's better. Before my plan was invented, Paint was sold in two ways—either "Ready Made"—or Paint Ingredients were bought and mixed together by a Painter. Both of these ways are at fault.

"Ready Made" Paint settles on dealers' shelves—sediment forms in the bottom of the can—the mineral pigments and chemically acting driers in "Ready Made" Paint eat the life out of the Linseed Oil—and Linseed Oil is the LIFE of ALL PAINT. Paint cannot be properly made by a painter, because of the lack of heavy mixing and grinding machinery.

My Paint is unlike any other Paint in the world. It's ready to use—but not "Ready Made." My Paint is made to order—after the order is received. It is packed in hermetically sealed cans—and the date it is made is stamped on each can by Factory Inspector.

Only PURE Linseed Oil and Pure FRESH Paint Ingredients are used in my Paint. Paint Ingredients and Linseed Oil found at local dealers' is oftentimes adulterated. I sell my Paint direct from Factory to User—at very low factory prices. You pay no dealer's or middleman's profits. I pay the freight on Six Gallon Orders or over. My paint is so good that I make this wonderfully fair test offer: When you receive a shipment of 6 gallons—or over—of my Paint, you can use two full gallons to test it.

If—after you have used the Paint—you are not perfectly satisfied with it in every particular—RETURN THE BALANCE OF THE PAINT TO ME—and the two gallons you have used won't cost you one penny.

No OTHER paint manufacturer ever made such a liberal offer. It's because my Paint is the finest Paint made—put up in the best way—that I can make such an offer as this. I go even further—I sell my Paint to responsible parties ON THREE MONTHS' TIME if desired.

I make three brands of Paint to suit the requirements of my immense trade. My Strictly Pure All White Lead Paint is absolutely the best high-grade Paint in the world.

My 40-60 Brand—Zinc and Lead Paint—is the best paint, in its class, on the market.

My Durability Paint has an immense sale everywhere and gives splendid satisfaction. This Paint is guaranteed for five years under an ironclad guarantee.

The Purity of all my Paints is guaranteed under a forfeit of $100.00 IN GOLD.

All of my Paints are packed in Extra Size Gallon Cans—guaranteed to turn out a full gallon measure of Paint—my customers' insurance of full measure.

For further particulars about my Made-to-order Paint and my Plan of Selling, send for my Paint Book—the most complete book of its kind ever published. It gives full descriptions of my celebrated Paints—and complete set of large Color Cards to select from—the biggest Color Cards ever put into a Paint Book.

With the Paint Book I'll send you Free Book of all kinds of Painters' Supplies—sold at Direct-to-You Prices. Write me today. Get My Book and My Plan to insure you better satisfaction and lower prices on Paint.

The Breakfast Food

The following Special Recipe for Children

Takes a little more time and trouble than to prepare in the ordinary way. But it has been discovered that this makes the ideal food for little folks.

Pour one quart of boiling water into a cold pan, add one-half teaspoonful of salt, and then stir in slowly one cup (one-half pint) of Pillsbury's Best Cereal.

Cook thirty minutes, or longer, in a covered pan set in boiling water.

Cooking three-quarters of an hour will not injure, but rather add to its delicacy. In such instances, however, it is often necessary to stir in a little boiling water to keep it from becoming too thick. Serve hot with cream and sugar.

has a fuller volume of tone and far more sustaining power than any two pianos. At the same time it is so fully under control, by means of a swell attachment, that the softest passages can be rendered with exquisite delicacy. For evening entertainments, etc., it is most admirable, and when otherwise musicians would have to be engaged, it will save its cost in one night, and is, upon the whole, the most perfect mechanical instrument in design, operation and effect, that has yet been produced.

The case is strongly made of solid black walnut, and is elegantly finished, forming a handsome parlor ornament.

By means of new and automatic machinery, the manufacturers are enabled to produce music rollers in large numbers so that we can offer them to the public at a price not exceeding the average cost of music paper; and a roller will give a very much better performance, besides Outlasting a Thousand Paper Sheets.

There are now ready over Eight Hundred sacred and popular tunes which have been arranged for the Roller Organs. Complete list will be mailed on application.

VACATION ON A WESTERN RANCH

By WILLIAM R. DRAPER

INDIANS sat in the shade of their tepees and puffed lazily at their pipes, while on the banks of the Arkansas River opposite a herd of wild, long-horned Texas steers were plunging madly toward a bar of quicksand with a dozen or more cowboys trying to stay their course. As our driver drew taut the lines to eight scrawny Texas ponies, and set the brakes, the ramshackly stage-coach came to a sudden stop in the growth of dwarfed trees, near where dirty tepees and lounging redskins denoted an Indian camp.

"Here's a tenderfoot camp all right," an observing young man who had been through the West before remarked cynically. "Got all the fixings, too. Looks as though the scene were studied out by a scenic artist for the especial benefit of those new to the West."

But this blasé individual was wrong. The scene was natural, and could be found on this big Oklahoma cattle ranch almost any time. Just now the ranch was getting ready to entertain a bunch of young fellows from an Eastern city, who had come out to spend their summer vacation.

Any day in that part of the country one might witness the round-up, the Indian dance, the chase after game—anything, in fact, common to western ranching on a huge scale. Only the tenderfeet were unnatural—polished boots and linen collars were not harmonious with sand hills and stage coaches.

The party of young men who had arrived at the One Hundred Ranch that same day were only a few of the many dozens of men and women from the Eastern cities who go West in summer and fall and accumulate experience and regain health on the big ranches. It is a fashion growing in popularity. The busy young men of the cities demand a cessation from office and shop in summer. Two weeks to a month are essential to continued health, ability and energy. Colorado, Michigan, Arizona, the mountain resorts of the East appeal to vacation seekers in emblazoned advertisements and continued illustrated literature. But many are seeking quiet and different fields. At all the popular resorts there is plenty of amusement, and lots of folks there to enjoy them, just as one finds in his own home city. To thoroughly enjoy a thing it must be different. That is why the broad expanse of a plains country appeals to many young men, and women also. On a big ranch one does not meet many persons, especially those whom he knows, or who are of his class. He comes in contact with Indians, cowboys, greasers, but they speak a new language to him. Their methods of enjoyment are new and novel. I mention a trip to the One Hundred Ranch in Oklahoma because it is a type of the big cattle ranches covering a hundred thousand acres or more, where young men may work on the plains at cattle roping, or in the harvest fields, and get a good lot of healthful exercise and enjoy the trip at little expense. There are many such places in the Southwest.

When once we had rid ourselves of dust and dirt at the common wash trough in the rear of the big house at ranch headquarters, our host, a big brusque cattle man, made us welcome to the camp by calling up a lot of cowboys and redskins and introducing us to them. A number of small portable frame shanties on the banks of the river were to be our sleeping quarters—the days we spent in the open on horseback. We found preceding us to the ranch a number of young men from all sections, college students, sons of wealthy men, and office men, whose search for a vacation something different was entirely earnest. They were gathered around the camp fire that evening of our arrival clad in overalls, slouch hats and black shirts, smoking pipes and enjoying the fanciful yarn of some cowboy.

The first evening was given to our Indian guests, for such they proved to be, having come up from their reservation to give the annual corn dance at ranch headquarters. The owners of the ranch had donated three beeves, and the Indians thought it was their duty to do the right thing. The following morning we selected ponies from the corral, and joined the cowboys on the round-up, eating that noon thirty miles from headquarters from the rear of a cattle-herder's grub wagon. That night, the chase after steers having taken us farther away, we rolled up in blankets and slept on the open prairie. The hike across the plains on the backs of bumpy mustangs continued three days, and when we got back to our little shanties on the banks of the Arkansas and slept in a real bed again, and put our knees under a real table, it was certainly delightful to know we had not been entirely lost to civilization.

The tenderfeet were given a couple of days' rest before engaging further in Western life. A round-up of steers for shipment to market is no

THE AMERICAN PULPIT

A SERMON BY
Rev. F. De Witt Talmage, D.D.

Love, the Chief Grace

TEXT—I. COR. 13: 13
"And the greatest of these is love" [R. V.]

TALKING with a friend before setting out on my European journey, I referred to my long-cherished desire to visit the Grand Canyon of Arizona, that I might study it and describe it to my Eastern friends. "It cannot be done," said my friend; "no living man could describe the grandeur and majesty of that wonderful scene. Just before I went there, I was told that a man approached the brink of that awful chasm, and as he looked across it and down into its depths and up into the sky, he dropped upon his knees and cried: 'O God! How infinitely great art thou! I never realized, until my eyes beheld it, this wonderful manifestation of thy handiwork!' All that you can do when you visit the Grand Canyon is to be overwhelmed with the immensity of its conception. It is greater, far greater than your wildest imagination could ever conceive."

In the Grand Canyon

Well, I said to myself, if that is true, there is one fact I will learn from the Grand Canyon. That will be its superlativeness as a basis for comparison. There are things that are above and beyond utterance. Paul heard things when he was caught up to heaven that he said were unspeakable; and, on another occasion, trying to describe the things God had prepared for them that love him, he said that eye had not seen, nor ear heard, neither had it entered into the heart of man; and John in Patmos fell down as one dead. When I read of these strange incidents, I shall always think of the overwhelming impression which one gets from his first view of the Grand Canyon of Arizona. It is a species of measuring-rule by which I estimate other impressions. It is this kind of culminating comparison that Paul uses in his text.

In the first place, Paul leads us into the celestial choirlofts of heaven. He gathers before us the sweet-voiced singers who once sang the song of the Nativity above Bethlehem of Judea. He leads those white-winged messengers of the sky to sing until their united choruses roll about us in great tidal waves of harmony. Some of us have heard the most famous songstresses on earth lift up their voices in praise. But never will our ears hear melodies like those celestial songs until at last as redeemed spirits we ourselves are singing the song of Moses and the Lamb before the great white throne of heaven. Then after Paul has in imagination led us through the boulevards of gold down past the great white mansions of the skies, and has overwhelmed us with the beauty, and pathos, and grandeur, of the inspiring oratorios of the celestial city, he says to us: "That singing is the most beautiful singing of all the ages. From human lips and throat could never come music so enchanting. But though we could sing like that, our song would be empty, and meaningless, and discordant, if it had not in it that one thrilling note of love. Though I speak with the tongue of angels, and have not love, I am become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal. It is love that gives celestial music its sweetness."

Love in the Heart Essential

Then Paul has us sit at the feet of great Hebrew teachers like Gamaliel and Hillel. He introduces to us the prophets of old. He brings before us the wise men or the magi of the East. He solves for us all the knotty social problems of the day, and leads us down amid the temples of old Egypt, and amid the wonders of Nineveh, and Babylon, and Rome, and Athens. Then he shows us the giants of faith as Titans changing the topographical construction of the earth. Then after he has piled learning upon wisdom, and intellectuality upon intellectuality, and superlative upon superlative, and made man omniscient as well as omnipotent, he utters these words: "And if I have the gift of prophecy, and know all mysteries, and all knowledge, and if I have all faith, so as to move mountains, but have not love, I am nothing." Ah, yes; love is greater than all the knowledge contained within the walls of an Alexandrian Library. Love is greater than the wisdom of King Solomon. Love is greater than the prophetic eye, which can look through the black curtain which separates the present and the events that will happen millions of years hence. Love is greater than the strength of the everlasting hills. Love is greater than the highest triumphs of art. For if we have not love, no matter how great our intellectuality may be, we are as nothing. Ay, we are worse than nothing. Is not Paul's second comparison again approaching the culminating superlative?

Then, as a guide leads us higher and higher over a mountain range, and we climb from peak to peak until at last we stand upon the topmost pinnacle overlooking all mountains, rising out of material into moral elevation, Paul says: "Love is more than this. Though you labor for others and seem to spend all your life in the service of your fellow men; though you become a pauper for their sake and go to the martyr's stake, if you do not love your fellow men, in God's sight all your deeds of self-sacrifice will go for naught. Yes, yes! How superlative does overtop superlative when Paul is elaborating for us the power and the necessity of love! Now, let us ask ourselves why love is so essential in God's sight, and why love should be the predominant passion of every human heart.

The Human Tree

Now, what is love? "Love," says the lexicographer, "is a feeling of strong attachment to another. It is pre-eminent kindness or devotion to another. It is affection. It is tenderness. It is the bond which binds mother to child, and husband to wife, and brother to sister, and friend to friend." That is the definition which I have abridged from different dictionaries. That definition means this: "Love is the strange power born in the human heart, which like a long arm reaches out and draws another life into that heart and makes the joy and the happiness of that other life more important than the joy and the happiness of its own life." In other words, "Love is the power which will make a human tree graft upon itself other human branches. And then that original human tree shall live simply for the purpose of bearing luscious fruit for the benefit of some other human life." In other words, true love finds its happiness in the benefits which that human life can bring to other lives rather than for the benefits of its own selfish life.

"How do you graft one tree on another?" I asked an old California horticulturist. "Well," he answered, "that depends upon the tree you intend to graft. If I was going to graft a lemon tree upon an orange tree—" "What!" I interrupted; "are nearly all our lemon trees grafted upon the orange tree?" "Yes," he answered; "nearly all. If I were going to graft a lemon tree upon an orange tree, I would go out to my orchard in springtime and cut a slender branch off my lemon tree. From this branch I would cut the healthiest bud, making the grafting bud about three-quarters of an inch long. Then I would cut the bark of an orange tree about two years old and gently press the lemon bud into the bark. Then I would hermetically seal the woods together with wax. Then when the lemon bud takes root and gets fully growing, I would cut off the orange tree just above the lemon bud so that all the strength of the trunk of the orange tree will be conserved to develop the lemon branch and the lemon fruit as it ought." Ah, yes, I said to myself, while my friend was talking. The orange tree has its branches cut off so its trunk can produce sustenance for the lemon branches. And that is love. We are the human tree and will have the branches of our own selfish desires amputated in order that we may bear fruit in the lives of our fellow men. That is the whole definition of love in a nutshell.

Living for Others

Tell me, friend, is your life a life of love? Are you the human orange tree with the lemon buds grafted into your bark? Have you had the selfish limbs of your own life cut off? Are you standing like the trunk of the orange tree, in the centre of the multitudinous orchards of the world, with your own name forgotten and obliterated, that the honor and the glory of Christ may shine in the lives of your dear ones? Are you driving your roots farther and farther into the ground in order to gather up the rich nourishment of the soil to nourish and feed hundreds of buds which have been grafted on your foundations? If you are, then you have the priceless characteristics which God honors above all other virtues. Then you have love—purified love, triumphant love, divine love. Then you are like the Lord God Almighty himself—for God is love and love is God.

Now, if the whole essence of love is to put the joy and the blessings and the happiness of others above a selfish happiness and joys and blessings, what is then, in its crudest form, the first duty of love? First, never to give another pain. Never do anything which will bring the tear to the eye, or the quiver to the lip, or the sol to the aching heart. It does not take much to wound the sensibilities of another. And if your first duty of life is to learn not to hurt yourself, so the first duty of love should be never to hurt or to wound the feeling of another.

The Fascination of Danger

Now, it was no easy matter to learn how not to do yourself a physical damage when you were young. It was only by painful experience that those laws of caution were mastered. For instance, when you were a boy you had a great habit of balancing upon the chair in the dining-room. Your father again and again warned you to stop. He told you that you would hurt yourself. But there was a fascination in making that chair tip back. You felt like a trapeze performer in mid-air. But one day you lost your balance and fell backward and struck your head against the mantelpiece. The cut was deep; the blood flowed, and you have a scar upon your head to this day. Then after that you never balanced upon a chair, because you knew your father was right. Or take that old habit you had of sliding down the banisters of the staircase. It was great fun until your hand slipped and you fell stunned upon the floor below. Or do you remember that toy cannon? You asked your mother if you could have one, and she said you were too young; but you thought differently, and you went and bought one on the sly. When you were about to play Bunker Hill the cannon went off at the wrong time, and instead of knocking down the toy soldiers your face received the charge, and your father and mother had to sit for hours digging the powder out. Ay, it was not easy to learn the lesson of physical caution. You learned it by suffering and pain; you learned it by tearful sorrow. And now you know that fire burns and a sharp knife cuts and a tumble will hurt. So you guard your body in the light of warning experiences.

Harsh Words

But the physical sufferings are never as bad as the mental. The accidental blow from the baseball that prostrated you on the field and gave you a headache for days, never hurt you as did the cruel word, the harsh criticism, the unkind misrepresentation of the man whom you had trusted as a friend. You all know what physical pain is. Some of you have been under the torture of the surgeon's knife. But though your physical pains have been great, I ask you if any pain has been so excruciating as that inflicted by one whom you have loved as a brother and who has brutally turned against you as Brutus struck his patron Cæsar? Now, my friends, if you have suffered so much from the attacks of those whom you love, beware how you give pain to others, whether friends or strangers. If you have suffered so grievously from the harsh words, the uncharitable insinuations, the malevolent untruths of those who have treacherously turned against you without cause, learn the lesson and look well to your own conduct lest you sin against another. The law of love works both ways. To deserve God's love, we must graft the lives of others into our lives and make their sufferings our sufferings and their heartaches our heartaches.

Brother, do not speak that harsh word. You have no idea how deep its probe cuts. Sister, do not make that bitter interpretation. You think the person against whom you speak it will not hear about it. He will. He will. He will hear about it in its meanest and most malignant form. I know your brother may have wronged you. But remember, the injustices which he

ACROSS SALVADOR ON MULE-BACK

The Market Place, San Salvador

I COULD not do better than to write you an account of a trip which I was enabled to take to San Salvador through an offering of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers. Our mode of travel is mostly by mule and consequently out of two hundred and fifty-eight miles traveled, but ninety-six miles were taken on the rain; the remainder had to be taken on mule back. During the twenty days I was away, I was able to visit en outstations.

As there are no hotels in the places we visited, we had to take our blankets and hammock if we wanted to sleep comfortably. After rolling up blankets and hammock, with some extra clothing, and strapping them with saddle bags full of provisions on our missionary mule, goodbye was said to the family, and we mounted our beast and started off for the station to take the train for the first thirty-six miles of our journey. Arriving at Armenia, we again mounted our mule and reached the first group of believers after an hour's ride. Here we had two services for a small company of believers. Early next morning we again went on to visit a large family on our way to Izalco. We arrived at noon, and, after a little refreshment, we gave a Gospel message, to the joy of the believers.

Leaving here we continued our journey to Izalco, arriving at 5 o'clock. This is a large town situated at the foot of the live volcano by the same name, called by the mariners, who travel up and down the Pacific, the natural light-house of Central America.

When I was in Izalco I could see the large rocks thrown out, rolling down its side at night. It was a beautiful sight to see the fiery stones come to the top and gradually roll down the outside. There is a rumbling noise like thunder every few seconds.

After an evening's service with a few believers, and a night's rest, early next morning we started off for Sonsonate, called the "City of Palms" (cocoanut palms); there is such an abundance of them that you can get them at five cents (gold) a dozen. There we had a small congregation, and we spent a day and a half with them. At noon on Saturday, in company with the native pastor, his wife and two young men, we mounted our beasts and went up into the mountains, to open a new station. It is one of the towns in the highest altitudes in Salvador. The mountain scenery is most beautiful, and the real Indian villages which we pass, with their thatched-roofed houses, are quite a contrast to the adobe houses built in the cities. After traveling twelve miles through the hot sun and dust, we finally reached Progreso at 5:30 P.M.

All was not to go peacefully with us. On the last night, through the instigation of the priest, a marimba, which is a sort of native piano, was engaged with three men to play it. They came and occupied the street in front of our hall and pounded away for two hours. That was a sign for the mob to collect, and they edged their way in our hall until there were eighty or more, some with clubs, others smoking and others blowing out candles.

Seeing that things were getting worse, I slipped out with a brother and sought the authorities, whom I found eventually, and they came and had the marimba removed and the mob dispersed; then it was 9 P.M., but we did not think it wise to let them have the victory, so we sang a hymn and preached as usual to quite a large audience, and many, for the first time, heard the glorious Gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

A Group of Believers in Ranchadoces

A Native Family in the Interior

From this mountain town we went down and down, passing through a desert and forest until we reached the coast, where we found it hot again. By noon we reached Matazano, where we have a company of thirty believers. After a day and a half, we continued our journey and reached the Pacific and traveled up the seashore until we reached the house of a believer, where several gathered to hear the word. After service we retired, but before we left we had a morning service, after which some of the believers got into a canoe and went up the coast in a canal back from the sea.

We wished to cross the sand bar, and it was just at the hour the tide was out, but the wind was so furious that it was dangerous to cross in a canoe. Eventually, we decided to try and get across, so the writer, with two others, got in the boat and we were able to get across at last.

On our homeward journey we visited a day and a half Chalchuapa, Candelario and Santa Ana; in the last named place we met a congregation of a hundred, and together we sat at the Lord's table to remember his death. After a full day's service, we took the train the following morning, and reached home at noon, thus ending an eventful and dangerous trip, which was filled with much blessing. Mrs. Bender's health is very poor, and our thought has been to take her back to the States, in order to get medical treatment, and while she is recuperating it is my purpose to return to the field to continue oversight of this great work, as there is no other missionary in Salvador. We trust that there may come some help for this most urgent need. A. H. BENDER.

has done you can never justify the angry thoughts you have against him. Love puts the sufferings of your enemy above your sufferings and the heartaches of those against whom you are uttering those stinging words above your own heartaches. "Love suffereth long and is kind, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil, beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things."

But we do not always want to be little children in the kindergarten of love. We do not always wish to be spiritual babies learning the negative side of the Gospel, which tells us, "Don't do this," and "Don't do that," and "Don't do the other thing." We should grow in grace and grow in spiritual power and learn to utter some other prayer than the little petition—

Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray the Lord my soul to keep,

which we learned years ago at our mothers' knees. And so the next great step in the way of love is, "Never give pain, physical or mental, to another." The second is like unto the first, only a little higher in spiritual life. When we love our neighbors we must rejoice with them in their days of prosperity. As their sorrows should be our sorrows, so their temporal and spiritual triumphs should be our temporal and spiritual triumphs. Their lives as trees are grafted upon us. Then we, as the old orange trunk supporting them, should rejoice at the gathering of their fruits just as much as though the autumnal nuggets of gold were taken from our own branches. Do you grasp the far-reaching significance of my text? "And the greatest of these is love." The more others prosper the more we should rejoice.

But, strange to say, some evil-minded cynics look upon the success and the prosperity of other people as an insult to themselves. They feel that if they cannot have all the honors and all the praises of success, they do not want any one else to have those honors. And not only that, but by sneers they will do all in their power to undermine another's work. Here, for instance, is a college president. For years and years he is the official head of the institution. For years and years he moulds the characters of the boys and the girls under him. He has the devoted following of the officers and teachers; but when his work is done, he sometimes seems to be angry because those officers and teachers give the same loyalty to his successor as they accorded to him, and because the college is making a greater success after he leaves the institution. Why should not that old college president be happy at the success of his successor? Why should not the minister be happy when he hears that the man who follows him in his pulpit is more beloved and is doing a greater work than he was privileged to do?

But you cannot rejoice with a man in his days of prosperity unless at the same time you are willing to sympathize with him in the days of his sorrow. And you cannot truly sympathize with a friend in his time of trial unless at the same time you are willing to do everything in your power to overcome his mental, moral and spiritual weaknesses, and help him to rectify the mistakes he has made. Have you been willing to do that? Have you such an overwhelming love of mankind in your heart that you will do everything and anything to help your brother out of his present difficulties?

Friend, could there be a better message for us to dwell upon this morning than this of love? "Oh," I said, "if I can only get my people to feel and practise this divine love, all will be well." Will you let this divine grace eradicate all hate and bitterness from your heart? Will you go to-day to the man against whom you have a grudge and take him by the hand and say: "Let us quit our enmities for Christ's sake." Indeed, it is not so hard for some of us to say that. For Christ, whom we love and whose example we are to follow, has taught us to pray: "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who have trespassed against us." Oh for a baptism of divine love! "And the greatest of these is love."

There is a star that beams on earth
With tender, lovely ray;
That lights the path of generous worth
And speaks a brighter day.
It is friendship.

There is a tie—a golden chain—
That binds with stronger hand
Than iron shackles of the cell,
Or all the arts of man.
It is love.

There is a gem—a pearl of worth—
As lasting as the skies;
More dazzling than the gems of earth,
Its splendor never dies.
It is truth.

Three angel spirits; evermore
They guard our thorny way;
And those who follow where they lead
Can never go astray.

For God hath given them alike
To childhood and to youth;
And age is mellowed by the touch
Of Friendship, Love and Truth.

"GOOD ANGELS" HELP THE NEEDY

Dr. Chapman, Mr. Alexander and Party Tour Philadelphia's Slums and Give Aid to the Poor

ONE of the most picturesque features of the revival which is moving Philadelphia more deeply each day, occurred last week when a group of the evangelists devoted an afternoon to carrying cheer and assistance to some of the poorest people in the slums. The day before, Dr. Chapman had asked the business men at the noon-day meeting in the Garrick Theatre for a collection to be used in giving provisions and money to deserving people in need of help. One hundred dollars was realized, and the following morning part of it was spent in purchasing baskets of provisions and coal; another portion was spent in buying dolls and toys to bring cheer into the lives of the children, and the balance was held for aiding specially needy cases.

At two o'clock in the afternoon, the party set forth on their errand of mercy. It included Dr. Chapman and his daughter, Miss Bertha Irene Chapman, Mr. and Mrs. Charles M. Alexander, Rev. W. P. Nicholson, an Irish evangelist, who has come to study the revival in Philadelphia, and a group of newspaper men. They set out in an automobile loaned by Mr. John Wanamaker, and in two carriages and a hansom.

When the slums were reached, the party was increased by two Salvation Army wagons, one loaded with twenty-four baskets of provisions and the other with twenty-four baskets of coal. Wherever they went, little groups of curiosity seekers gathered to witness the unusual sight of an automobile and carriages proceeding through the main streets. At times the carriages were left behind, as the route lay along narrow alleys, through dark passageways, and up zigzagging stairs where the odor was almost overpowering, or into dark basements. In all, sixteen or more needy families were visited. With each was left a basket of provisions and one of coal, while in some cases silver and bank notes found their way into homes of misfortune or sickness. Scores of children were made happy by gifts of dolls, musical tops, rubber balls, illustrated Testaments, and handy Gospels.

The party was piloted by Col. Alexander Damon, head of the Salvation Army in the city. The first place visited was a Salvation Army Day Nursery, where twenty-four children, ranging between the ages of three and eight years, were made happy by gifts of dolls and tops given them by Mrs. Alexander and Miss Chapman. One little girl with a wan white face slept in a chair all through the visit of the "Good Angels." Miss Chapman placed a doll in the arms of the sleeping child.

At one place, a Jewish family was discovered at the top of a tenement, who were on the point of being turned into the street because they could not pay the rent. There were seven children in the family, huddled in two small rooms. The husband had been out of work for a long time, and as they could not pay the rent, they had been ordered to go. Happily the calamity was averted through the timely visit of the party. At another point, an Italian family were found who were in dire need. The husband had had his foot severely injured and was unable to work. The help came in time to prevent suffering and brought joy to many hearts. A sad case was found on Fifth Street near Monroe. A mother and five children had recently been deserted by the husband and father. The children had all been sick. Words can scarcely describe the cheer brought to this home by the timely aid. While Dr. Chapman and his daughter and Mrs. Alexander were investigating this case, Mr. Alexander, who was outside, had slipped over to a fruit stand, purchased a quantity of fruit and nuts, mounted a chair and begun distributing it to the poor boys and girls of the neighborhood.

The most touching scene of the afternoon occurred in a garret on Delancey Street. Up four winding flights of stairs the party toiled, until they faced a poor, feeble old man. He was ragged and unkempt, and the attic was a picture of desolation. Broken pieces of china and old clothes and old furniture were strewn around the room, while a pile of rags on a tumbledown bedstead showed where the man lay at night. As the party stood grouped around him, expressing words of sympathy, Dr. Chapman began asking him in tender tones about his past life, and whether his mother was a Christian woman. He assured the doctor that she was. Finally the evangelist asked if the man himself was a Christian. Hesit-tating a moment he replied that, though he had attended church regularly for years, yet his life had been full of trouble.

"But that is the reason you need Christ," declared Dr. Chapman. "He is the one that will help us out of all our troubles and trials."

For two or three moments Dr. Chapman lovingly and earnestly appealed to him to accept Jesus Christ as his personal Saviour.

The man was apparently deeply moved, while some of the party stood about praying silently. After a few moments the man, in trembling tones, declared that he would take the Lord as his Saviour. As the words fell from his mouth, all knelt while Dr. Chapman prayed for another sinner redeemed. As the party arose from their knees Mr. Alexander started up his "Mother Song":

O mother, when I think of thee,
'Tis but a step to carry;
Thy gentle hand up my brow
Is leading me to Jesus now.

There was joy the little garret. Before the party left, material aid was given in the form of both provisions and money, so that the two months' overdu rent could be met.

From this point the party passed down to a low district near the river. A big crowd was gathered in the narrow street. Seeing the numbers of children, and idle men, and women with bared heads and sleeves rolled up to their elbows, Mr. Alexander requested the party to stop a moment, while he sang "Jesus, Lover of My Soul." The crowd increased and stood in wondering amazement. A holy hush seemed to fall upon the auditors as the song proceeded.

Passing along the streets or standing at a corner Mrs. Alexander was constantly busy talking to some poor forlorn girl with a torn dress and dirty face; telling some toil-hardened woman about the love of Christ, or giving out Gospels or Testaments to boys and girls and grown people. Along the route, Miss Chapman was scattering joy and gladness among the most sorrowful children, and making their hearts glad by giving them shining quarters, of which she seemed to have an inexhaustible supply. It was with difficulty that she could be gotten out of the surging crowds of children.

This personally mingling with the poor of the city was one of the happiest innovations yet attempted in revival work. It not only brought good cheer to the hearts of the poor, but it brought joy to the hearts of the evangelists as well. It also showed the people that they were working for all alike.

It was simply another effort in the great task of endeavoring to reach all classes and conditions throughout the city with the Gospel message.

Burmese Buddhists

WORSHIP of the image of the Buddha as practised in Burma is vividly delineated in the photograph on this page. It is the boast of the Burmese that nowhere, unless possibly in Ceylon, are the teachings of the great Gautama preserved and followed with the purity that they are in Burma. Yet taking the teachings as they have come down to us, no one can conceive of the teacher accepting in any sense approving the rites practised by his followers of this generation; they are so utterly alien to his doctrine as we conceive it. The Buddhist priests have their own way of reconciling the formality, the rites and ceremonies of the worship in their temples with the Buddhism that Gautama taught, but to us it seems that it is removed from it as far as a pontifical mass in St. Peter's is from the simplicity of a Quaker meeting. The extraordinary fact is that Gautama, born as is supposed in 40 B.C.—about the time that Ezra and Nehemiah were gathering their people to return to the Holy Land by permission of Cyrus—began to declare his faith in opposition to the Brahmanism which had dominated the thought of India for more than a thousand years, should have been able to establish it single-handed, and that in our time, twenty-five centuries later, it survives and is the creed of five hundred million human beings. As far as we can gather from the traditions that have come down to us, Gautama revolted from Brahmanism, and like Ecclesiastes, sought spiritual peace by various means. He first tried philosophy, and then bodily austerities by which he nearly lost his life. At last he made his great discovery, as he states in his sacred writings, that "To cease from sin, to get virtue, to cleanse one's own heart, is the only way to peace. This," he said, "is the doctrine of Buddha." To die to desire, to make absolute self-surrender to God, to be utterly indifferent to the world, sustained by the inward life, "to be nothing" until finally individuality was swallowed up in the Nirvana, that was Buddha's idea as it appears to the modern student. It is difficult to understand how such a doctrine could have become corrupted into the Buddhism that kissed the toe of an image, if we had not seen men prostrating themselves before a crucifix and praying before a relic. If the Buddhist who really apprehends the true doctrine of Buddha could be persuaded to see it carried forward, as Paul carries it, to its legitimate conclusion as revealed by Christ, he would learn how self-renunciation and death to the world leads, not to Nirvana, but to fuller life.

I am crucified with Christ; nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me. (Gal. 2: 20.)

Oldest Newspaper in the World

News comes from China of the suspension of the Pekin Gazette, which was established nearly a thousand years ago. Its first number was issued in 911 A.D., and in the year 1351, a hundred years before the discovery of America, it became a daily, and has been issued regularly ever since. Its early numbers contained chiefly edicts from the throne, memorials from provincial governors and reports from various officials. In one number there was a report by Li Hung Chang of a flood of the Yungting River in which he admitted that the officers had risked their lives in their efforts to prevent it from inundating the surrounding country, but he recommended that though they tried to do what was beyond the power of man, they should be stripped of their buttons or deprived of their rank because they failed to avert the flood. Other characteristic Chinese incidents were reported from day to day. The files of the venerable paper are among the curiosities of typography. During a part of the eighteenth century it was printed in the imperial palace from movable copper type, and in the last eighty years from movable type carved out of wood. The Chinese Government will now supplant the publication by the Government Gazette, which will be much larger and conducted along more modern lines. It will be the official government organ. The paper will of course refrain from criticism of the government, though there is no government in the world that needs it more. The Oriental idea of the functions of journalism and the right divine of kings prevails there yet.

Will thou then not be afraid of the power? . . . He beareth not the sword in vain. (Rom. 13: 3, 4.)

Money Hidden in a Wall

A lady residing in a village on Long Island, N. Y., appeared recently before a surrogate in Queen's County to administer the estate of her deceased father, a farmer who had lived alone and died at the age of eighty-five years. She and her sisters, who knew something of the old man's habits, had made a thorough search of the premises and had found one of his storehouses. He had caused a wall to be built in his kitchen enclosing a vacant space about eight inches square. There was no entrance to it, but near the top, a narrow slit had been left in the set down as lost. The night watchman was aroused some nights afterwards by a pawing at the stable door. On opening it to investigate he was nearly knocked down by the missing horse, who rushed in and up to his usual hay rack. He had no harness on and was covered with foam. It is conjectured that, being unharnessed to change the rig, he had escaped and had made his way to his owner's stable. His fidelity is a reproach to those who voluntarily wander from God's fold, or yield to the temptations of the enemy of souls.

The ox knoweth his owner and the ass his master's crib, but Israel doth not know, my people do not consider. (Isa. 1: 3.)

Stitching a Wounded Heart

A young man who has won some renown as an athlete was taken to a hospital in Yonkers, N. Y., suffering from a pierced heart. The friends who took him to the hospital said they had been returning home from the Athletic Club when they encountered a number of foreigners, who molested them. In the scuffle that ensued one of the foreigners drew a stiletto and stabbed the young athlete to the heart. Happily a vehicle was near, in which he was rapidly conveyed to the hospital. There the surgeons determined on a desperate operation, which was the only hope of saving his life. Two ribs were removed and the heart exposed. Three stitches were taken in the organ itself and two in the sac in which it is contained. Since that time the patient has been slowly recovering. The surgeons have now hopes of his living, as he has already survived a longer period than a patient has ever been known to live after so critical an operation. The surgeon who performs such an operation had need be very skilful, but even he has to confess failure in some cases where the wound is not physical, but spiritual. Only too often he whose heart has been wounded flees to suicide as the only resource. He feels that human help is vain, and he does not seek the help to which Israel's king appealed.

Do thou for me, O God . . . for I am poor and needy, and my heart is wounded within me. (Ps. 109: 21, 22.)

Killed by a Rebuke

In a recent trial it was found, from the inadvertent confession of a juror, that a verdict had been reached by the foreman flipping a coin. When questioned, one of the jury said they were hopelessly divided as to giving a verdict for the plaintiff or defendant. Some of the jury were likely to suffer in their business interests by delay and so they agreed to abide by the throw of a coin. If it came down head, the verdict was to be for the plaintiff. The judge was highly indignant when he heard of the proceeding and fined every member of the jury $50. He also administered a stinging rebuke and discharged them. One juror felt the disgrace keenly. He declared that he could never meet his friends; they would have read the judge's remarks and would always regard him as an unworthy citizen. His family tried to cheer him, but his uniform reply was, "You should have seen that judge; you should have heard what he said; I can never forget it." He could not sleep, lost his appetite, wandered listlessly about the house and finally took to his bed, and in spite of medical help, he died. The judge was justly indignant, but even he could not have foreseen the effect of his words. We may well consider, in view of such an incident, what must be the effect of a sentence pronounced by the Judge of all the earth, at whose words when he was upon earth the fig-tree withered away (Matt. 21: 19), when he upbraids those by whom his salvation has been rejected.

If the word spoken by angels was steadfast, and every transgression and disobedience received just recompense of reward; how shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation? (Heb. 2: 2, 3.)

masonry. Through this aperture the old man had evidently thrust gold and silver coins from time to time. He could not get at his hoard except by tearing the wall down, but he appeared to be quite content. After his death the wall was removed and the money was gathered up and counted. No less a sum than $7,000, in coins of various denominations, from gold eagles to silver quarters, covered the earth inside the hiding-place. How long it had taken the old man to make the accumulation is not known. It had never been of any use to him and might have fallen into the hands of strangers, if his daughters had not searched for it, yet he had always been intensely avaricious and penurious. Like the man whom the ancient preacher knew, his life was vanity.

Yet is there no end of all his labor; neither is his eye satisfied with riches; neither saith he, For whom do I labor, and bereave my soul of good? (Eccles. 4: 8.)

Stolen Horse Returns

The strange recovery of a stolen horse by a livery company in Chicago is reported by a newspaper of that city. The horse, attached to a buggy, was hired out to a man who returned to the stable with the plea that while he was in a house, thieves had stolen the horse and buggy and had driven away. There was no clue to the thieves, and after a fruitless search the animal and vehicle were

Kind Words From Germany's Empress

WHEN the American Church in Berlin was dedicated in November, 1903, plans had already been formed for having a reference library and a selection of good American and English literature for the use of the students. The need of such a library had long been apparent. When Richard Harding Davis, W. E. Curtis and Winston Churchill, at different times, had visited Berlin, it was difficult for them to verify statements about America, as so few American books were available, and the colony had to be searched as with a drag-net to find for them what they wanted.

Mrs. Dickie, wife of the pastor of the American Church, resolved that this state of things should not continue. From the gifts of such friends as Mrs. Russell Sage, Mrs. Edward D. Adams, Mrs. Sinclair of New York, the late Mrs. D. M. Ferry of Detroit, and others, and from donations from such American publishers as Scribner's, Harpers, Dodd, Mead & Co., the Appletons of New York, and Wanamaker and Gebbie of Philadelphia, she was enabled in February, 1904, to have the library opened. The United States Ambassador, in making the opening address, said that whilst every stone in the American Church would have associated with it for all time to come the name of Dr. Dickie, the library, used by multitudes of students and visiting Americans, would be an enduring memorial to Mrs. Dickie's enterprise and industry, and she would always be regarded as a benefactress to her fellow countrymen.

The library was opened with only 300 volumes. The Ambassador said: "Despise not the beginnings, for Harvard University began with 300 volumes, and its usefulness has gone to the ends of the earth. So might it be with the modest beginnings of this library."

The library is beautifully furnished with Oriental rugs, with a table, on which are thirty-one different American and British magazines. It has five daily American newspapers, and it has now about 2,000 volumes. It has a monthly average attendance of 660 students, not to mention those who come for the exchange of books. Its usefulness has attracted the attention of the German Church authorities, and the fame of it has entered even into the palace. Not only

On the 10th of January, Dr. and Mrs. Dickie were suddenly summoned to the telephone with the announcement that Her Majesty, the German Empress, would be at the church in three quarters of an hour. She was received by them and conducted all over the church. She was especially interested in the library. She saw on the walls autographed photographs of President Roosevelt, the German Emperor, the Crown Prince, and the American Ambassadors. On Mrs. Dickie's remarking that Her Majesty would see some members of her own visit, she sent in a little bouquet of flowers to the "housemother." On the following Sunday afternoon, she sent a baumkuchen, or German cake five feet high, to be put on the table from which the refreshments were served to the students. She sent also a large collection of potted plants to surround it. Later, Her Majesty sent Queen Victoria's letters in three volumes. She inquired what book was most used by the students, and when she learned that Lavinia's Dramas of Richard Wagner was so sought for that a second copy was necessary, she generously sent the duplicate. She told Mrs. Dickie, when she saw the arrangements for the comfort of the students and the writing-desks for them to write their home letters on, that she was quite delighted with the idea, and hoped to introduce such a system of library, writing, and reading rooms in the German churches abroad.

She was extremely gracious in all her ways, and a more devoted Christian woman is hardly to be found in all the world than Her Majesty the German Empress.

Mrs. Dickie has added new shelves that cover the one remaining side of the library room. But many of these shelves are still empty, and she takes this opportunity of making an appeal to the generosity of American publishers, of American university libraries which have duplicates, and to the American people generally, who are interested in the welfare of American students abroad, to supply special works on music, art, travel, and history, or money to purchase the same. Any gifts of money or books for the American Church Library in Berlin, if sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, will be forwarded to their destination.

does Mrs. Dickie sustain the library by her own gifts and the gifts of friends, but she has a "five o'clock tea," which is frequented by students on Sunday afternoon when they are specially homesick, and when the touch of their fellow countrymen and countrywomen is a great boon. About 120 young people attend this service, enjoy a social hour with refreshments, and then sing hymns together until ten on Sunday night.

There is a devoted Christian woman, Mrs. MacDunough (the "housemother," as the Germans would call her), who has her apartment of four rooms on the top floor of the church-house. She is the friend and comforting counselor of homesick and belated American girls.

household there, and that they looked a little lonely, she said, "Yes, I think I will come down beside them," and so her autographed portrait is to be added.

Her Majesty walked around the table on which the magazines were laid, took each one successively in her hands, and a smile like sunshine came over her countenance when she lifted THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and said to Mrs. Dickie: "This is the kind of literature that I wish the young people to be reared on."

She then visited the Sunday School room and asked about the afternoon tea, and going up to Mrs. MacDunough's apartments she visited every room, and asked if she might also be allowed to go into the kitchen. Having finished her small task, and after three thousand wild cattle have been brought from the farthest sections of the ranch and placed in a 160-acre lot, it is still another matter to get them into cars ready for shipment. As the frightened animals were crowded into smaller pens along the railroad many broke away, and it required quick and skilful riding to bring them in again. The vacationists were allowed to take part in these exciting races, and had not the ponies many of us rode been trained, we would surely have suffered collisions with the enraged beasts. It was as much as most of the boys could do to hold on to the saddle horn.

Indians of the southwest, especially those in Oklahoma, are friendly with visitors. We went into a camp of Otoes on the banks of the Kaw River, talked with their medicine chiefs and erstwhile warriors, through an interpreter of course, and found these Indians quite willing to become paleface citizens. The Indians of Oklahoma are forsaking their wild habits very rapidly in recent years, and taking up the ways of the white people. They cling to gaudy costumes and harmless dances, but the warlike sun dance, or the dangerous ghost dances, which stir the redskin's soul against his paleface brother, is not indulged in longer.

I was taking a trip through Texas and New Mexico last summer, and in almost every community met young fellows from the East who were spending a vacation on some cattle ranch. In Arizona, near Yuma, a party of wealthy young men from New York have bought a small irrigated ranch and spend their vacations there, and when they are not on the ranch rent it out to cattle men for pasture. Instead of traveling abroad, these men take up their abode in Arizona, either in summer or winter, when in need of rest, and explore the ancient ruins of that quaint and historic territory. They are afforded diversion by watching Indian dances, etc. As there is said to be a buried treasure in that part of the country, the young men are in the mountains a good deal of their time looking for this. In the Pecos Valley ex-Governor Hagerman, of that territory, a friend of the President and a Yale man, owns a big ranch, and he has friends from the Eastern colleges as his guests all the time. Polo playing is one of the popular sports on the Hagerman ranch. In the Mesilla Valley of Texas are many ranches of visiting tenderfeet. Carlsbad, N. M., and Bliss, Okla., are tenderfoot towns set out in the open cattle country. More mail comes to these towns from New York than all other points.

a ranch vacation that cannot be obtained at other resorts. It is different and cheaper, it offers a view of the passing cattle-raising industry (on a large scale), and the dying Indian race, not to be obtained again in history.

CHELSEA, THE FIRE-SWEPT CITY

General View of the Burned District of Chelsea, Mass., Showing Three Miles of Ruined Buildings

ONE of the most disastrous fires that have occurred in recent history laid in ashes on April 12 the business district and much of the residential part of the city of Chelsea, Mass., and ten thousand people were made homeless, all within the space of a few short hours.

Like many other fires that have in the past got far beyond human control, this one started from a small bonfire. Some boys lighted a heap of rags back of the Boston Blacking Company's factory on West Third Street. Under ordinary weather conditions the fire would have smoldered itself out, but that morning the wind was blowing a gale of sixty miles an hour, as the local weather bureau registered, and the sparks were carried for long distances. At first the bells only rang one alarm, and the firemen who responded thought they would soon have the small fire extinguished, but the gale blew up the flames faster than they could put them out. The sparks were carried to twenty different wooden buildings about the blacking factory, and they were soon collapsing in seething sheets of flame. Then, from the southwestern part of the city to the southeastern, the fire spread with great rapidity.

A dozen factories and many tenement houses near the blacking factory fed the flames, and all the firemen of the city were put into action in the district and hurry calls for help sent to Boston, which is just across the Mystic River from Chelsea, and to other nearby cities and towns. All responded with alacrity and sent large detachments of their fire departments. Houses were razed to the ground in an attempt to confine the fire to one locality, but the sparks blew across the open spaces that were thus made.

The banded fire departments of the various cities, together with the almost exhausted Chelsea men, united at Everett Avenue to hold the fire to the east side of the street. If it got to the west side all felt that the entire city was doomed. Twenty engines puffed as if they knew the desperate struggle they were engaged in, and up and down the avenue long lines of hose, each manned by half a dozen firemen, sent their arching streams into the wave of flame that seemed to charge at them a hundred feet high. For a moment human grit and courage seemed to hold the fire at bay, but the attempt was useless. High overhead burning shingles sailed on the wind, and burning rags and paper seemed almost to drop from the sky itself back of the firefighters. Clouds of burning sparks fell many yards in their rear. To save their engines and their lives the firemen were compelled to retreat.

The business district now began to go as soon as the flames crossed the avenue. The People's Methodist Episcopal Church on the east side was filled with worshipers who were listening to the sermon, and had no realization of the great fire raging so near them. A man entered and whispered to the pastor that the sparks had already ignited the roof. The latter dismissed the congregation, and all left the building without the slightest show of panic. When they reached the street many of them saw that their homes were utterly destroyed. In a few minutes the church was in ruins. Church after church was dismissed, and in all cases the people left without a stampede for the doors. In some cases there was a simple word of prayer first spoken by the pastor, or the people sang a verse of a hymn, and then they filed out in order. All who could tried to reach their homes and rescue their household goods, but for hundreds of them home had ceased to exist, and all of their worldly effects consisted of the clothes they wore. Fire was already creeping up the spire of the Polish Catholic Church before the people left the building. In fifteen minutes the church was crumbling to the ground. The flames burned down the wooden tenement district and reached Broadway, the main business street. Here the buildings were of stone or brick, but they burned with great rapidity. The entire business district a little past noon was a great sheet of fire, over which hung a dense pall of black smoke so heavy that it hardly seemed to drift in the gale that was blowing.

The troops were ordered out by the Lieutenant-Governor, and soon the Eighth Regiment was on the ground keeping order and helping the distracted people. The United States marines, with fixed bayonets, lined the bridge from Charlestown and kept outsiders from entering Chelsea. A long and pitiful stream of fugitives poured all day and far into the night across the bridge leading to East Boston. Every one was carrying a picture or some cherished keepsake that had been saved. Here and there in the crowd rumbled a cart heaped with furniture.

In City Hall Square the Baptist Church first caught, then St. Luke's Parish House, the Unitarian Church and several other public buildings seemed to catch at once, the flames shooting yards high with a deafening roar. The City Hall was the last to go, the flames jumping over the wide space about it.

Late at night the fire in Chelsea was declared by the Fire Chief to be under control, though streams were kept going for several days, for fear some blazing ruins might start another conflagration.

There was much suffering, many of the homeless people being without shelter for the night. Tents were brought from the State Arsenal, and food and clothing were contributed by nearby cities. The total loss is many millions, but estimates vary as to the exact amount. In the business district the loss is a total one, as nothing of value was saved. Good order was preserved, and there was no looting about the ruins. A few figures will show how great was the havoc wrought. When a record was made it was found that among the buildings burned were thirteen churches, two hospitals, five schools, the City Hall and another municipal building. The city is a scene of desolation. In some places, as far as the eye can see, there are nothing but ruins. In the residential districts even the trees are but blackened stumps.

The firemen deserve great praise for the unflinching way they faced the dangers of the day, and many of them are now in hospitals as the result of wounds and burns. Relief committees are actively at work doing all possible for the stricken people who have lost all.

JEWS RECEIVE THE GOSPEL

THE mission work under the charge of ex-Rabbi Leopold Cohn among the 250,000 Jews of Brooklyn reports a season of great spiritual blessing. Never before have the Jews attended the meetings so numerous. The hall in Williamsburg is packed, meeting after meeting, and the utmost attention is paid to the preaching of the Gospel.

There were five baptisms on one evening recently. Converts who have come out this season have endured persecution from all sides. One poor Jew was put out of a workshop because "the boss did not want him to talk there about Christ." His acquaintances wrote to his wife in Russia that he had become an apostate. She was shocked and wrote him a touching letter, pleading with him not to forsake the faith of his fathers. He is steadfast, however. He brought his brother-in-law to the Mission after a while; and when, at the close of the meeting, he saw him ask for tracts to read, his eyes filled with tears of gladness. The next evening he brought his landlord and said to the missionary, "I have suffered loss of work and many other things for Christ's sake; but that is nothing to what this man threatens me. He says I must get out of his house. I have no money to pay rent in another place. Please explain it to him, for he says that unless you can make him believe it is the right religion, he will throw me out of the house." The missionary had a long talk with the landlord, who finally relented.

The new converts meet every Monday night to strengthen one another in their new-found faith, and to testify for Christ. This has aroused the interest of the other Jews, who call these Monday night meetings "Holy Monday Night!" Several Jews have come in merely out of curiosity, and in some cases, with the result that before the meeting closed, they, too, were confessing Christ. An elderly Jewish convert arose and said he thought he was the oldest in the audience (being seventy-four years old), and he thanked God that in his old age, after so many years of traditions and superstition, the Lord had taken him out of it, and now he was more than glad to serve Him.

The work in Brooklyn is supported by voluntary contributions, and a monthly paper is published which will be mailed to any reader who is interested, and who will address Mr. Cohn at 620a Quincy Street, Brooklyn, N. Y. He will gladly acknowledge any contributions sent to him for the work.

Questions and Answers

J. S., Reedsburg, Wis. 1. Were there horses on the American continent before it was discovered by white men? 2. On what parts of this continent were buffalo or bison found? Were they east of the Mississippi River? Were they in South America?

1. No; the first horses were brought over by the Spanish explorers of Mexico, and the horses of the Western plains are descendants of a Spanish breed. Horses were brought to New England by the earliest colonists. 2. While most of them were found west of the Mississippi, some were found east of it. There is a species of buffalo in South America.

B. W. A., Lyndonville, N. Y. What about playing flint? It is all the rage with church people.

For the sake of example, if nothing else, Christian people should let cards severely alone. They are the tools of the gambler and the sharper. We know nothing whatever about the game you mention, but it is doubtless like all the rest.

J. E. M., Filer, Idaho. To what extent has Cuba been granted her independence by the United States?

Cuba is practically an independent country. As her independence was granted by the United States, this country is consequently bound to a great extent for the good conduct of the new government. Cuba cannot make treaties with foreign powers without first consulting the American government, so when the peace of the island was disturbed by the recent revolution imperiling international relations, the world looked to us to see that order was maintained. A new election will be held soon and our troops withdrawn. Governor Magoon recently offered to appoint natives as provincial governors if all three parties would agree on the men to be appointed, but they were unable to do so.

Mrs. N. G., Oklahoma City, Okla. Is it any healthier to sleep with one's head toward the north than the south? If so, why?

Some claim that north of the equator one should sleep with head to the north as the electric currents flow that way, and south of the equator the reverse. We do not know whether the idea possesses any real sanitary value. (Write to an agricultural journal about times of planting.)

G. W. R., South Lima, N. Y. Is there a dam in the Nile River and when was it built?

In 1902 a dam was built across the Nile at Shellal, forming a great reservoir and doing away with the cataract at Assouan.

A reader of THE MAIL-BAG kindly sends us the following in regard to a recent query:

DEAR CHRISTIAN HERALD: I am an old subscriber. In looking over the questions and answers, I was very much interested in the question, Where is the key to the Bastile? September, 1892, my husband and I visited Washington's home, Mount Vernon. Among the many interesting relics, we saw the Bastile key, well preserved, hanging in the reception room. The key was framed and with a glass over it. The writing under the key, giving its history, was yellow with age.

Mrs. JOHN SLING.

V. H. W., Laurel Branch, W. Va. Why did Joshua command the sun to stand still if as astronomers tell us, it always does stand still?

He may have supposed that there was no other way of lengthening the day. It was a common delusion at that time that the sun did actually rise and set. Joshua was a good and brave man, but no one supposes he had knowledge beyond his period. You will notice that the book of Joshua is not written in the first person, but Joshua is called by his name, as if the book was written by his secretary or some other person. He seems to have had some doubt as to the literal truth of the story.

He says (Joshua 10: 13), as many a man has said since his time, "Is not this written in the book of Jasher?" and he goes on to disclaim responsibility for it, by admitting that no such lengthened day had occurred in his experience, nor in previous history. Jasher was a poet, and in describing this wonderful battle, in which so much was accomplished between sunrise and sunset, used a poet's license.

This, from a Boston reader, is likely to find a sympathetic echo in many other quarters:

In the city of Boston there is too much immigration. The foreigners coming here are skilful and strong. Not being used to the ways of this country, they will work cheaply and can turn off more work than American labor for far less money. What is to become of good American labor in the near future?

J. B., Waltham, Mass. Who was it that wrote, "There are no occult forces"?

It was Victor Hugo who used the phrase in a famous passage. His words were: "There are no occult forces. There are only luminous forces. Occult force is chaos, the luminous force is God. Man is an infinite little copy of God; this is glory enough for man. I am a man, an invisible atom, a drop in the ocean, a grain of sand on the shore. Little as I am, I feel the God in me . . . When I go down to the grave I can say, like many others, I have finished my day's work; but I cannot say I have finished my life. My days will begin again the next morning. The tomb is not a blind alley; it is a thoroughfare. It closes on the twilight to open on the dawn."

him was named Delilah, but there is no record of his having married her.

Mrs. M. C. L., Maxton, N. C. Is local church government right? Does it constitute any part of the Christian Church?

Certainly it is right and does form part of the Church. It is essential that all things should be controlled by principles of law and order, and Church government is as necessary as any other government. You will find the necessity of order in all things relating to the Church repeatedly commended in the Scriptures.

J. R., Armstrong, M.D. In your Sunday School Lesson on the "Resurrection of Lazarus," Jesus is said to have wept four times. Please explain.

Jesus wept at the grave of Lazarus (John 11: 35); he wept over Jerusalem (Luke 19: 41); he wept in Gethsemane (Heb. 5: 7); he cried out on the cross when he was dying (Matt. 27: 46). In this last case, though tears are not mentioned, it has been appropriately said by Mazoomdar, in The Oriental Christ: "At last came the moment when he had a tear to weep for himself. It would not be human, not natural, were it not so."

J. D. D., Navarre, O. Can a man be a good moral man and not be a Christian?

Unquestionably; but one's own virtues or good works are not sufficient. Salvation is God's free gift to man through Christ his Son, and it is only by accepting that is very indefinite. The incident Paul mentions in II. Cor. 11: 32, must have occurred about A.D. 33. If he was executed, as is generally believed, about A.D. 58, the Epistle to Philemon would probably be written about A.D. 56 or 57, but how old Paul was then, is a matter of conjecture. His worries and hardships had prematurely aged him beyond a doubt.

C. L. Smith, Lancaster, Pa., writes, with reference to a recent article in this journal on "Methodists to Meet in Baltimore":

The Methodist Church at Soudersburg, Pa., is either the third or fourth oldest original building in America, and either immediately precedes the stone chapel in Frederick County, Maryland, or follows right after it. It stands to-day as it stood in 1802—with the exception of an addition of about twenty feet in front to correspond when it was dedicated by Bishop Asbury. An early history of Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, says: "The Soudersburg, Pa., church is among the earliest settlements of Methodism. The first services were held here in private houses in 1772. The first church (log) was erected in 1779. The present church was erected in 1802 and was dedicated by Bishop Asbury. The ground on which the church stands was bought for the sum of thirty-two pounds, eighteen shillings, Pennsylvania money. Bishops Asbury and Whatcoat visited it in 1803."

The New $3,000,000 Post Office to Be Built in New York City

THE proposed Post Office building is to be erected on Eighth Avenue, on the two blocks from Thirty-first to Thirty-third Streets, with the principal front on Eighth Avenue and the facades on the streets extending back a distance of 335 feet. In studying the problem, the aim has been, while keeping in mind the practical uses of the building, to give it the monumental character which a government building of such importance should possess. While the design of the exterior has been carefully studied in its relation to the Pennsylvania Terminal Station now in process of erection, the object has been to give it a distinctly governmental expression. The question of the proper relation between the two buildings as regards style, material and scale has also been carefully considered. The principal facade consists of a row of Corinthian columns terminated at the north and south ends by pavilions containing niches. This colonnade corresponds to the public corridor, which extends the entire length of the facade. The facades on the streets are a continuation of the same motive, pilasters being used instead of columns, also terminated in a pavilion at the west end. Ample access is given to the building by steps on the principal facades and on the street facades. The ground on which the Post Office will stand cost the government $1,660,540. The architects are McKim, Mead & White.

W. S., Coolspring, Pa. 1. Why is John 5: 4 omitted from the Revised Version? 2. Would men be good if Satan did not tempt them to sin? 3. What was the name of Samson's wife?

1. It seems to have been inserted by some unauthorized person. The best and earliest copies of the Bible do not contain it. The revisers, therefore, following their usual rule, omitted it as spurious. 2. How is it possible for any one to know? We think he is blamed for a great deal of which he is innocent. G. R. M., Lyndhurst, N. J. By whom and when was the silver star placed in the floor of the grotto in the Church of the Nativity?

Although there is no special historical record on the subject, it is an obvious inference that the silver star must have been placed there by the early Christian Church (probably between 340 and 400 A.D.), or by the Crusaders, to mark what was believed to be the precise site of the Saviour's birth.

I. G., Pasadena, Cal. How old was Paul when he wrote the epistle to Philemon in which he speaks of himself as "Paul the aged"?

There are very few materials on which to base an opinion as to Paul's age. He was "a young man" when Stephen was stoned in A.D. 31 (see Acts 7: 58), but

Health Notes for Women

WHILE it is perfectly true that few of us can escape an occasional illness, it is equally the case that good health is within the reach of most, not occasionally but all the time, if a few easy rules are observed. Each of us has a definite capital of nervous energy on which she can draw for the daily work, just as a merchant draws on a fund to carry on his business. Prudent merchants keep an emergency fund in reserve, so that if an extra demand comes, they may be prepared to meet it without exhausting every resource. A great many women have the pernicious habit of exhausting their working capital of strength every day while they have nothing in reserve. Usually, when remonstrated with, these women declare that they cannot help themselves, there is so much to be done, and unless, in many homes, it is done by one pair of hands, necessary work will be neglected.

The children in school have a problem in which by one gradation after another figures are reduced to their lowest terms. We women should reduce our daily work to its lowest terms. Eliminate, for example, some portion of the superfluities. If you are making a frock or petticoat for the darling daughter, be satisfied with a single deep hem, and do not spend your strength in clusters of tucks that reach half way up the skirt. If you do your own washing and ironing, have as few as possible in the weekly wash of those elaborate and dainty articles that leave one with an aching back and wearied arms, when she should have left the ironing board.

Some time ago, in reading the biography of a Puritan grandmother, I noticed the extreme simplicity of her own and her sister's dress in childhood. The calico slips in summer, the straight woolen frocks in winter were easily cared for by the house-mother in that simpler day.

It is often an easy matter to sit instead of to stand when performing household tasks. A woman should by preference sit whenever she can, and in preparing much of the food used on the table daily, she can actually do better work if seated in a chair, than if bearing her weight on her feet. A great deal of fatigue is caused by reaching up to shelves above one's head, and by carrying on dish-washing and other tasks at a sink that is too low for comfort. The table or sink at which one works should be adjusted to her height.

Try to systematize errands so that instead of a half dozen journeys to pantry, attic and cellar, everything may be accomplished in a single excursion. A wife should allow herself to be aided in many departments by the greater strength of her husband, and by the willing hands and feet of children. Do not say that it is easier to do this or the other thing yourself, than to remind a thoughtless though good-humored man of the matter, and do not shirk teaching a son or a daughter some useful knowledge on the same score.

Wearing apparel, when one is at work in the house, should be loose enough to allow plenty of breathing room, and the unfettered action of every muscle. I have never felt inclined to lead a crusade against the wearing of corsets, because the modern corset is a very different article of dress from the tight-fitting stays of an earlier day, with the terrible iron breast-work in the front. A well-fitting corset that presses nowhere tightly over heart or lungs, and that is reinforced by hose supporters, keeping the stockings in place, is a great comfort to the ordinary woman. Such a corset need not be boned at all, if one has a liking for a corded waist.

Excessive use of coffee and tea is almost as perilous to health and nerves as a resort to other stimulants. The use of narcotics to induce sleep or to alleviate pain, unless they are distinctly ordered by a physician and taken under his direction, is a deadly peril. There are any number of varieties of ease-producing drugs containing more or less morphia, and once the habit of taking them is formed, it subtly steals over a woman until it fetters her body and soul. Avoid as you would a deadly cobra the use either of alcohol or opium to give you temporary strength. When the nerve capital has been exhausted, the only way to restore it is the way of rest. It is a thousand times better to stop before you are tired out, to be thrifty with your health capital, to save yourself from falling by the way, than to wait until you are the victim of a definite nervous disorder. Nature has her danger signals.

A Half-Century of Service

The title of heroine is surely deserved by Miss Ida Lewis, who for fifty years has held the post of keeper at Lime Rock Lighthouse, Newport Harbor. Miss Lewis has not spent a night away from the lighthouse in the half century between her fifteenth and her sixty-fifth year. She is now about to take a vacation, leaving

THE BUBBLE-BLOWER

Blowing bubbles! ah, my dears,
Some of us do it all our years.
Rainbow-colored in the sun,
Watch the bubbles every one;

If they only would not break,
These bright bubbles that we make!
But I will not moralize
When I see your laughing eyes.

her lamp to the care of her brother, who has long been her assistant. One is not surprised to hear that Ida Lewis, whose health and strength have been a marvel, and who, in the course of her service, has saved eighteen persons from drowning, has now succumbed to insomnia and nervous prostration. Every one will hope for her a speedy return to her normal health and strength. No sailor or coast guard has been more daring than she, and her presence of mind and ceaseless fidelity have no doubt saved thousands of craft from wreck in storm and tempest. All honor to brave Ida Lewis. Her rare merits have been recognized fitly by the American Cross of Honor Society, which has bestowed upon her its cross, she being the first American woman to receive it; and she has also received a pension from the Carnegie hero fund. She was only a slip of a girl when she made her first gallant rescue of the drowning, and she has retained throughout her life the same fearless courage and quick decisiveness of action which were her heritage from a sea-faring ancestry.

From Personal Experience

SEVERAL weeks ago, the question was propounded on this page as to whether, in the partnership of husband and wife, woman or man carried the heavier end. A correspondent, who has carried both ends with undaunted heart and wonderful success, sends a bit of her experience. Here it is:

"For nearly nine years I have kept a home over the heads of a large family, as well as supplied the wages of men and women who, as workers, were dependent upon what my farm could produce for the wages they earned. I have tramped over fields with hammer in hand and staples in my pocket, along with the men, to see that the repairing was done satisfactorily. I have stood at my post early and late to see that the crops were put in shape for both seeding and harvest when necessity demanded. I have gone on to a load of grain or stock, and even logs, to see that they were delivered at the market or mill when there was a shortage of hands to do it, or to drive a team. I have tended chickens and raised calves, fed pigs, and always have had a garden. I have gotten meals when the girl was not at home, and I have made the beds and swept when necessity demanded it. I can wash the dishes and I have made the butter, not little dabs, but a hundred pounds a week and even more. When the sewing girl was crowded I have had to lend a hand at the machine; I have raised a family of six children and educated them, not alone in books, but they can—both girls and boys—do the work they are called upon to do, when the time comes to have homes of their own. I was a farmer's wife for over twenty years. I was a farmer's daughter until I went into my own home, being the oldest of a pioneer family, with an invalid mother, and no boys old enough to do work; I often helped indoors and out, wherever necessity called. Owing to these early days I had no high school education, but had a father who always gave us good reading and plenty of it, a habit that was carried into my own home when I came to it. While I am a very busy woman and my life is one constant round of responsibility, I am supposed to help in the church, Sunday School, Aid Society, and if there is an extra thing to do I am the one who is expected to have time to do it. Now, I am going to tell you, if I can, what I think of the whole matter: It makes no difference what we have to do or where we work, it is toil or drudgery, just in the manner we do it, or the disposition we do it in. If it is our duty to do anything, if we have taken upon ourselves responsibilities, that must be carried out. We can accomplish more and make a far better showing if we do that thing, no matter how hard, with a cheerfulness that will go far to making our lives more of a joy than a burden. We are doing things far too often by taking hold of the wrong end of the handle."

Recreations of Royal Ladies

So far from being idle pleasure seekers, who care nothing for feminine industries, the royal women of Europe set an example to the rest of the world by the manner in which they employ their leisure. Royal people, as a rule, are very finely educated, and great pains are taken to prepare them for their eminent station. They are not, however, occupied exclusively with severe studies, as is shown by the following:

"Quite a number of royal ladies are efficient work-women. The Archduchess Frederick of Austria, for instance, makes scented wax candles. The Duchess of Guise is a skilful milliner, and can also turn out excellent artificial flowers. The Duchess Philip of Wurtemberg makes not only ordinary surgical bandages, but elastic stockings. Princess Hermine of Reuss has exhibited the work she does in her capacity of watch-maker on various occasions. Princess Arnulf of Bavaria makes a good deal of beautiful lace. Princess Carl of Sweden is noted for her ingenuity as toy-maker: all the gollywogs and other dolls, as well as the dolls' houses and furniture, which fill the nursery of her children, the Princesses Margarethe, Martha and Astrid, are her work."

How Should Church Funds Be Raised?

IN a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we invited our readers to submit their views briefly as to the best methods of conducting a church's finances—how to raise the necessary funds for current expenses, debts, missions, benevolences and other purposes. Especially was it desired that they should give their views, based on experience, wherever practicable, as to whether the pastor should or should not be burdened with any responsibility for the church's financial management. Many letters have been received, and a number of these—which will be read with general interest—are given below:

Let Women Collect

The question of raising money for the church is a hard problem. The facts of the case are that each one who professes to serve God should lay aside a certain amount for such purpose as his income will allow. A great many people are discouraged from giving because there is no end. Take one society—they raise $1,000,000 this year for a purpose, and next year they expect $2,000,000.

I think some lady of the church would be the best person to collect money, and let her explain to the people just how this money is going to be expended.

Tobias, Neb. G. S. GILLESPIE.

Employ a Collector

All pastors' salaries should be collected by some appointed person or persons. In my personal experience in the practice of medicine, I found it better for myself and patrons to have a well-adapted person to collect my accounts, than to endeavor to do my own collecting. But all other necessary incomes ought to be urged upon by the pastor, for the simple reason that he is supposed to have the clearest view of conditions in all church matters at home and abroad.

Agosta, O. DR. C. H. ARTZ.

A Pastor's Helper

Your question about church finance is most important. I have seen some glaring cases of injustice. The church officers having a surplus will get a more expensive choir, or will put down a new carpet, or get a supply of new hymn books, ignoring the fact that the pastor is underpaid, and is scarcely able to dress his family decently, or live in a comfortable house. He cannot bring his condition before the church without appearing selfish, yet his constant need affects his work. By all means, therefore, let him have a church board of finance on which there should be some friend of his own who will look after his interests. The Protestant Episcopal Church has a parish warden and a vicar's warden, and so the interests of both pastor and people are cared for.

Brooklyn, N. Y. JOHN WELLS.

How a Laundress Acted

No church has any right to ask its pastor to look after that end of the business. There is sure to be a business man in the church who can do the work a great deal better. The secret of raising church funds is that Paul gave I. Cor. 16: 2. Lay by, or hand to the treasurer, every week; not monthly or quarterly, but every week. It comes easier for the poorer members that way, and even the richer members will give more that way. Besides, it cultivates a habit of systematic giving. An example will show my meaning. I was connected with a church in which there was a poor laundress. She undertook to put a dime in her envelope every week. It was all she could afford; there was no doubt of that. One Sunday I found in her envelope a quarter with the dime. Thinking it may have been put in accidentally I made it my business to call on her and ask about it. No, she said, it was not a mistake. One of her customers had been entertaining some young ladies, who had sent her extra washing. She thought a share of her increased income for the week "ought to go to the Lord." The church could have done without the hardly earned quarter, but the incident showed the value of the system. Some prosperous merchant having an extra good week, or some broker effecting a good bargain, might be moved in the same way, and the treasury of the church receive an appreciable addition.

Philadelphia, Pa.

A Sure Remedy

You are quite right in saying in your article on Church Finance that it is useless to depend on the lay members of the church for liberal and spontaneous giving. Then there is an annual deficit to be made up by weary dunning. I have had some experience in various churches, and have found only one system successful. It is this: Call a meeting of the congregation, pew-holders or general attendants early in the year and decide on how much shall be spent in each department. So much for pastor's salary; so much for repairs of edifice, etc.; so much for the assistance of sick and dependent members; so much to the church boards. Then ask each member to say what he will give, pointing out that an equal division would be unfair. Add up the total promises and if that total falls short of the other state the fact and adjourn the meeting for a week.

At the adjourned meeting, state the facts and ask whether the appropriations shall be curtailed, or whether they will increase their offers. By all means use envelopes, and collect them according to the Pauline system every week, so that each member will realize whether he is keeping his engagements. All this should be done without troubling the pastor, who has work enough of his own.

Jersey City, N. J. EDWARD WHITE.

Give the Pastor Time for His Own Work

As a preacher, let me say: I do not think the preacher ought to be financial manager of a church. A preacher has no more business managing the raising of his salary and the incidental expenses of the church than a railroad engineer planning how he shall get his salary. The preacher once had a study, now he has an office. Let the finances be run by others with his advice when needed. Any church of 100 members ought to support a preacher as well as the average among the 100 are supported.

If you want your preacher to preach with power, let him have time for meditation and prayer, and don't make him errand boy, financial manager and Sunday School superintendent.

Bedford, O. CHARLES A. FREER.

Individual Responsibility

I think the church problem to raise money to defray expenses can be solved in this way: Let each member feel it his duty to help bear the church burdens. None are so poor or weak but they can help in some way. If all try I know from experience that the Lord will help.

Kingsville, Va.

Church Union a Solution

In the town where I attend church there are two churches where one small church could hold all who care to attend. As far as I have observed similar conditions prevail everywhere. When Christians are willing to unite and work together according to the teachings of the New Testament, the financial question will solve itself.

Avon, Me.

DANA SWEET.

Early Habit of Giving

The responsibility for the finances of any church should not rest with the minister or with any committee. It should rest with the individual member, just where it belongs; and the only way the individual member is to be brought to recognize and to meet his responsibility, is for him to be taught from childhood to lay aside the Lord's portion for the Lord's use.

A comparatively small constituency in any church, who thus act, will solve almost any financial problem presented to it.

REV. DAVID E. POST.

*Pastor Baptist Church.

A Board and Regular Accounting

Outside of special collections, the pastor should not be expected or asked to raise the current expenses of the church. It does not only consume his time required to look after the spiritual welfare of the church, but for like reasons the church officers have a dislike for soliciting money year in and year out. But some one must do it. The very best plan I ever knew was the appointment of a finance committee each year, whose sole duty is to look after the finances of the church, make a report every three months, stating the amounts raised, what for and how paid out.

When congregations do business on business principles, using no doubtful means to get money, but go straight down into their pockets to get it, they seldom have trouble.

L. B. LEECH.

Smithfield, Pa.

Dependence on the Holy Spirit

Neither the minister nor any board of officers should take the responsibility. The present condition of the church shows that that has been done to its detriment.

If the church has faith and leans less on human wisdom, to trust less in human methods and to lean on God and follow after the teaching of his Word, who can doubt that the grinding of our financial machinery would be vastly lessened, and the demonstration of the Spirit be far more apparent?

T. A. TRUMBULL.

Troy, N. Y.

Relieve the Minister of the Burden

I feel strongly upon this matter. I think on the material side the church should consider itself as a business corporation, the Board of Trustees answering to a Board of Directors, and they, rather than the minister or individual member, should be responsible for the finances or income of the church. At the beginning of the fiscal year they should make out a schedule of all known expenses with a contingent fund for emergencies; then plans should be made to raise such funds. In my judgment the Board of Trustees should always have some women members; they are good workers and good financiers.

My objections to having the minister responsible for the income of the church are: first, because of his personal interest in a monetary way, his salary usually being the largest amount to be raised, and it is certainly embarrassing and unpleasant to beg for what is his legitimate due. Second, if he preaches strong, helpful, intellectual sermons as required these days, if he would interest and hold the people he has neither time nor thought for the purely business end of the church work. He should be consulted when financial plans are matured, but not to have the burden of them.

Oakland, Cal. SARAH C. BORLAND.

The Church Question

The minister is held responsible for pastoral duties in the church as preacher, teacher and leader. The pulpit is his official place, as shepherd over his flock. The church board should constitute officers capable of maintaining their respective positions with as much system and promptness as would be required in any organization where current expenses must be provided.

Mrs. F. I. McCREA.

Sheridan, Mont.

Should Share the Responsibility

The responsibility devolves, according to the New Testament, upon neither of the parties referred to exclusively. Responsibility is a very comprehensive term, and involves sponsorship, making the party or parties referred to liable for payment. The love of Christ is calculated to constrain every member to do his duty. Then, what are the necessary funds to be raised, can only be measured by that which is their duty for the advancement of his kingdom. The very least is said in the New Testament about financial affairs, but what is said is very comprehensive, and will not admit of opinion, but are positive directions. You do not find any of the ministers of the Gospel, whether apostles, pastors or evangelists, making a personal appeal, either for a salary or an increase in one. The broad principle of supporting the Gospel, and contributing to poor saints, is given in I. Cor. 16: 2, and II. Cor. 9: 7. "Every man according as he purposeth in his heart, so let him give; not grudgingly, or of necessity: for God loveth a cheerful giver."

WM. RAMSEY.

Salem, N. Y.

The Presbyterian Custom

In the Presbyterian Church, the minister, elders and deacons have plainly "the finances" under their charge, and a "bulletin" states plainly every Sabbath what all the conditions of the church are. Appeals to Presbytery are always in order where there is any difference of opinion on any subject. The General Assembly is the court of last resort.

St. Louis, Mo.

WILLIAM WEBB.

The Way to Failure

We suppose our minister has a call to one church to preach the Gospel, and when he is very much interested in who shall be the officers of the church, and also as to the finances of the church, his congregation drops off and he is preaching to empty pews. Such has been my observation for more than fifty years.

Knoxville, Ill.

C. A. BUCKLEY.

Regular Assessment

We have a Finance Board of three members, one elected each year. This board presents to the church, once each year, the amount of funds necessary for the year, and the amount agreed upon is used as a basis for the levy. The board proceeds to find the number of mills needful to raise the amount agreed upon by the church. The church treasurer notifies each member of the amount due from him. Funds for special, mission or any other calls are raised by collection or subscription. We have used this plan now for some sixteen or eighteen years, and find it preferable to any other.

In the Kamchatka Mission

By CYRUS TOWNSEND BRADY

THE Bishop was not at all sure that that was true. Not that he suspected Charlotte of a deliberate deceit, but he was afraid her present feelings had led her to say more than she realized. He made no comment, however, as Charlotte ran on.

"But he never asked me once I had refused, once I had driven him from me; and I let him go although it broke my heart. Bishop, he never asked me to join him."

"Did he want you to come?" "Want me? Why . . . ?" The woman laughed again, she was so happy. "He loves me almost as much as I love him."

"More," said the Bishop.

"More?" asked Charlotte.

"Yes," was the answer, "for he never asked you to come."

Well, some four months after his visit with Charlotte, it happened as the Bishop had said. The governors of the missionary society under which he worked formally passed resolutions removing Winnington to the United States. They sent him a cablegram by the newly opened Saghalien-Kamchatkan line announcing his transfer and asking his acceptance before they proceeded to appoint another man to the Kamchatkan mission.

By rare good fortune the telegram found him at home. It reached him on the same day that a letter from the United States had been brought to him by the semi-annual ship from San Francisco. Letter and telegram lay in his hand together. It was her letter, of course. The Bishop had allowed her to write to him of the proposed change. The old man knew that the telegram would probably anticipate the letter, and he offered no objection when she proposed to write. The telegram had come and had been read a short time before the letter. When he saw her familiar writing on the envelope of the letter he delayed to open it. He sat there with it in his hand wondering.

Of course she had known nothing about it at the time that letter had been written, but she would know it now, for the same telegram which had carried the tidings to him would have flashed the news over all the land. Winnington's heroic persistence and success in the Kamchatkan mission had given him a far greater meed of fame than he dreamed of in his isolation. Still he realized that sufficiently to know that such tidings must have gone everywhere, and now, at this hour, Charlotte knew and was thinking of him, waiting for him to come back to home and her.

A long time he sat with the telegram before him and the letter in his hand. And then he opened it and was startled to find that even so far back as four months ago she had known that he was to be called back to the United States. The letter was one paean of joy. He was coming back, back to her. He would find such welcome in her arms, such solace in her affection for all that he had gone through. The years of absence would be forgotten in the joy of that meeting from which there should be no more parting. The whole letter was one glorious, passionate appeal. It said, "Come! come to me, to my arms, to my heart, to my soul, my beloved!" with every ringing, throbbing, beating word.

Winnington read it through slowly, slowly, slowly. He laid it down on the table beside the telegram and covered his face with his hands. He was no saint, was this missionary. The years of repression had but intensified his own feeling. Even as many waters cannot quench love, nor many floods drown it, so much cold could not freeze it. His heart was still warm in its response to her.

On the one hand lay the grim country which he had learned to love, and where he had learned to serve; on the other hand stood the smiling, radiant figure of the woman whom he had not forgotten. He might go to her now with a clear conscience. He had wrought faithfully and well. The approval of his superiors, the fathers in God to whom he looked up, was expressed in that cablegram. He had earned a rest. He had put the service of the Master before everything, and now he could go back and some one else could take up the burden.

And then there flashed into his mind pictures of humble huts where he was welcome; pictures of rude and rough places where he brought gentleness; pictures of misery and sorrow which he had alleviated; pictures of vice which he had rebuked and restrained. He thought of the many places where he came as God's messenger of peace and hope and love. These Kamchatkan years had been after all not much more than years of preparation, the learning of the habits and customs of the foreign peoples on the shore, the learning of the language and thought of the humble natives in the wilds. God had been preparing him to do something great. He had been blazing a trail, making a way—his own—and now a future was opened before him. Another man might come, but he would have to begin all over again and learn just as Winnington had learned. It would be years before a stranger could take his place.

There arose before him in the balance the alluring figure that appealed to his heart, and on the other side the grim presentiment of a duty stern and inexorable. Ah, yes, he could not decide quickly or easily. The man was shaken even in his indomitable soul. Between the two emotions he hung in the mid-air of indecision—how long he could not say.

It was night outside when he finally rose and went out in the snow under the cold stars and threw himself down upon the land to which he was giving his life—ay, and more than his life, his love—and fought it out to victory in the dark with God. So Jacob of old in a sunnier clime had wrestled with the Angel and had conquered.

Far away Charlotte sat, expectant, waiting. The Bishop had telegraphed her privately of the cablegram before it was sent, and she knew that it had gone. If Winnington were on the seashore, his answer, the Bishop had said, might be expected within the next thirty-six hours. She wondered if he had gotten her letter. She hoped and prayed so. It would be too great a stroke of fortune, she felt, for cablegram and letter both to reach him at the same time. What would he do? It shows how she realized the fine temper of the man that even then she was by no means sure of his decision. She passed two days in an ever-quickening agony of suspense, and then the blow fell.

The Bishop published instantly the cablegram received from Winnington in which he thanked those who sought to remove him for their kindly, generous thought of him, but declared that he could not feel it to be right for him to leave Kamchatka then. He had just begun to do the work for which he had been set apart. Others more able, more devoted than he might be found, but they would have to acquire with slow years the experience in which he rejoiced. He would stay in Kamchatka by the help of God.

It was all in the evening paper. The girl sat stunned, staring at the flaring headlines which told of the heroic resolution of the man she loved. He was not coming back then. He could not have had her letter. Her heart stopped its beating. Oh God! could any human being endure such disappointment and live? She stretched out her arms to him as if she would clasp him through the air across half the world even. He had

A FOOD DRINK

Which Brings Daily Enjoyment.

A lady doctor writes:
"Though busy hourly with my own affairs, I will not deny myself the pleasure of taking a few minutes to tell of my enjoyment daily obtained from my morning cup of Postum. It is a food beverage, not a stimulant like coffee."

"I began to use Postum 8 years ago, not because I wanted to, but because coffee, which I dearly loved, made my nights long weary periods to be dreaded, and unfitting me for business during the day."

"On advice of a friend, I first tried Postum, making it carefully as suggested on the package. As I had always used 'cream and no sugar,' I mixed my Postum so. It looked good, was clear and fragrant, and it was a pleasure to see the cream color it, as my Kentucky friend always wanted her coffee to look—like a new saddle."

"Then I tasted it critically, for I had tried many 'substitutes' for coffee. I was pleased, yes, satisfied with my Postum in taste and effect, and am yet, being a constant user of it all these years. I continually assure my friends and acquaintances that they will like it in place of coffee, and receive benefit from its use. I have gained weight, can sleep and am not nervous." "There's a Reason." Christ's Promise to His Apostles

JESUS and his disciples tarried in the upper room after the Paschal feast and the Lord's Supper; and Jesus said to them: "These things have I told you, that when the time shall come, ye may remember that I told you them." And what were the things he had told them? That they should be hated and persecuted, and even killed by those who thought they were doing God's service; for among the Jews were "zealots" who were in the way of doing that sort of thing, as there still are among ourselves self-appointed critics who would like to do it. Jesus was not an alarmist, but he wanted to fortify his disciples against the evils which should come upon them.

"These things I said unto you at the beginning, because I was with you." What tenderness and consideration this reveals on the part of Jesus. And it should reconcile us to not knowing what the future has in store for us; God knows, and he is able to help us bear whatever of sorrow or joy may be our lot.

The Departure

"But now I go my way to him that sent me." When Jesus had thus spoken, such a sense of loss came over the apostles, that they forgot to ask him "Whither goest thou?" They had been constantly in his presence for a little more than three years. Even strong men sob sometimes. It may have been so with the apostles, for Jesus said, "Sorrow hath filled your hearts." And Jesus comforts them by saying: "It is expedient for you that I go away," and he added: "If I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you." He was really saying, "You ought to rejoice at my going away, for you will have all the greater blessing which will come to you through the Holy Spirit." George Macdonald has said: "Jesus took himself from the sight of them that loved him, that he might hide himself in their very hearts."

"And when he is come, he will reprove the world of sin." There is no searchlight like the Holy Spirit. When evil doers have a searchlight thrown upon them, they run, and try to find a cover of darkness. But darkness and light are both alike to God, and sinners can never get out of his sight. With Dr. Joseph Parker we say: "May God the Holy Ghost show us sin till we hate it—show us the reality of sin until we feel our need of the Cross! May he show us the fulness of the love of Christ until we know what is meant by Christ's ability to take up our sin, our secret sin, take it up in his pierced, bleeding hands, and cast it away forever."

The Holy Spirit in the Heart

"And of righteousness and of judgment." There is a new respiratory invention for the use of firemen carrying enough air under pressure to last one hour. It is said that a man equipped with this apparatus entered a room filled with the fumes of burning sulphur and worked there a full hour, coming out with his throat and lungs perfectly free. The air of heaven is in the Holy Spirit, enabling Christians to live righteously in this world, not for an hour, but for all time, and without fear of judgment.

"I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now." Jesus knew that after the Holy Spirit should come into the hearts of his apostles they would have new light. In themselves they had little power to comprehend Christ. Peter did indeed make the great confession: "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the Living God." And Jesus made reply, "Flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto you, but my Father who is in heaven." It was in that same conversation that Christ is said to have conferred the keys to Peter. But soon after Christ showed him that he was not infallible when Peter presumed to utter a bull against the atonement: "Far be it from thee, Lord" (Matthew 16: 21-23).

*International Sunday School Lesson for May 10. The mission of the Holy Spirit, John 16: 4-15. GORDON'S TEXT: "I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you forever," John 14: 16.

At the Mount of Transfiguration, Peter and James and John had all shown that they did not understand Jesus, for after Jesus had talked there with his two guests from heaven, Moses and Elijah, about his decease which he should accomplish at Jerusalem, the apostles proposed building on the mountain three places of worship, one for Jesus, one for Moses and one for Elijah, which would have made the mountain a sort of Saints' Rest, instead of a place of preparation for work in the valley below, where a demoniac waited to be healed. At other times when Jesus talked of his kingdom, the apostles had so poor a conception of its spiritual idea, that two of them asked Jesus to give them the chief places, one on his right hand and the other on his left. Jesus knew well just how little they were able to bear; that Peter would deny that he knew him, and that all of the apostles would forsake him, and flee before the band who should come to make him their prisoner.

"When the Spirit of Truth is come he will guide you into all truth." To see how this was fulfilled we should read the whole book of the Acts of the Apostles. Then we should see what a change the coming of the Holy Spirit wrought in them. Before Pentecost they were samples of the natural man; after Pentecost they were samples of the spiritual man. In geology, the latest stratum exhibits the higher form of life; so in the Christian life we are called to be not low-level Christians, but high-level Christians; not to be minimum Christians, but maximum Christians.

The Spirit's Mission

"He shall glorify me"—and shall show it unto you. As we read in the Acts of the Apostles, we note how the wonderful deeds of healing which the apostles were given power to perform, were always done "in the name of the Lord Jesus." To him who had all power, all honor was given, and so Jesus was glorified. Jesus was still working among men, but from the greater vantage point of heaven. "The apostles proved their hearts unspiritual before Pentecost by their blindness to great spiritual truths, as clearly as they proved themselves converted after Pentecost by their clear spiritual vision."

The central truth of the lesson is that the mission of the Holy Spirit is to prepare human beings to do the will of God, and in so doing to be a blessing to each other. Dr. Guthrie said: "Of what use would be the machinery which is to be moved, without a force adequate to move it? Without a main-spring within the clock, however complete all its wheels, pinions, pivots and axles, these hands would stand on the face of time, nor advance one step over the numbered hours. So were it with the renewed soul without the Spirit of God to set its powers in motion, bring them into play, and impart to them a true and heavenward character. For this purpose God fulfils the promise, 'I will put my Spirit within you.'"

Praying for Power

Bishop Henry W. Warren thus relates what was told him by D. L. Moody, the evangelist: "I can myself go back almost twelve years and remember two holy women who used to come to my meetings. When I began to preach I could see that they were praying for me. At the close of the Sunday evening meetings they would say to me: 'We have been praying for you.' I said: 'Why don't you pray for the people?' They answered: 'You need the power.' 'I need power?' I said to myself; 'why, I thought I had power.' I had a large Sunday-school and the largest congregation in Chicago. There were some conversions at the time. I was, in a sense, satisfied. But, right along, these two godly women kept praying for me, and their earnest talk about 'anointing for special service' it came to me to thinking. I asked them to come and talk with me, and we got down on our knees.

"They poured out their hearts that I might receive an anointing from the Holy Spirit, and there came a great hunger into my soul. I did not know what it was. I began to cry as I never did before. The hunger increased. I was crying all the time that God would fill me with his Spirit. Well, one day, in the city of New York—oh, what a day! I cannot describe it; I seldom refer to it; it is almost too sacred an experience to name. Paul had an experience of which he never spoke for fourteen years. I can only say God then revealed himself to me, and I had such an experience of his love that I had to ask him to stay his hand. I went to preaching again. The sermons were not different; they did not present any new truths; and yet hundreds were converted. I would not now be placed back where I was before that blessed experience if you would give me all Glasgow—it would be as the small dust of the balance."

The Spirit's Call

Apollos was an eloquent man, mighty in the Scriptures, and taught diligently the truth as far as he had received it from John the Baptist. But when he came to Ephesus, Aquila and Priscilla, after they had heard him speak, took him to their own home, "and expounded unto him the way of God more perfectly," concerning the Holy Spirit, and Apollos became a Holy Ghost Christian, and preached with abundant success in Achaia and Corinth (Acts 18: 24-28).

"Let it be," said the Lord to David and his men of war when, lying in ambush and expecting divine assistance, they waited for the signal of battle, 'let it be, when thou hearest the sound of going on the tops of the mulberry trees, that thou shalt bestir thyself.' Such a signal, like the feet of the angelic host marching over the tops of the trees, heaven may vouchsafe to us in some holy desire, emotion, thought, which, if yielded to and improved, may lead to heaven; but neglected, rejected, or repelled, may leave us to perish.

"And there are diversities of operation; but it is the same God which worketh all in all." George Frederick Williams relates the following illustration: 'A missionary to an isolated tribe in Central India was confronted by a peculiar difficulty. There were no words in the native language for many of the Christian conceptions, and the missionary was afraid to use the English words, lest, when taken bodily into the language, they would have no meaning for the people. So he was led to make many shifts to express the ideas he wanted to convey. When he came to the words

'Holy Spirit,' his difficulties reached a climax. There were no such words in the native language, and he could not explain them in terms of warmth and inspiration and zeal and fervor; because living in a tropical country, where vitality was low, all of these conceptions were extremely distasteful to the people. Their word for 'cold,' however, by a curious transposition of ideas, was the one which best expressed the idea he wanted to impress upon their minds. In their hot and exhausting climate, anything cold was pleasing and encouraging. So for 'holy' he took the word 'cold,' and for 'Spirit' he took their nearest word 'heart,' and that tribe is still praying that the 'cold heart' may come upon them. Could one imagine a stranger way of teaching the warmth and enthusiasm and fire which the Holy Spirit engenders?"

Some scientists are claiming that life can be created in the laboratory, independent of God; nay, even more, it is claimed that it has been done in the Cavendish Laboratory in Cambridge by the action of radium on gelatinized bouillon, and the little bodies evolved resembling living organisms, are called "radiobes," but the term seems in a fair way to become a synonym for myth. Other scientists have examined radiobes and assert that they possess none of the attributes of life, and what appeared to be growth was due to the evolution of a gas, to which the name "emanation" was applied. Neither can we have spiritual life without God.

Emblems of the Spirit

The Holy Spirit is also compared to the wind. It is like the strong north wind in its purifying work; like the warm and gentle south wind in quickening the seeds of every noble word and deed in the heart gardens of life (John 3: 8). The Holy Spirit is yet more, a divine light and fire, that purges away dross, and give the light of knowledge and of joy, and the fire of enthusiasm to those who receive it. It was this divine fire that filled the bush out of which God spoke to Moses (Exodus 3). The same fire made up the pillar that led Israel and abode above the tabernacle (Exodus 40: 38). The Holy Spirit is also pictured as a cloud, in which water and wind and fire all have the hidings of their power (Isa. 6). The Holy Spirit is also like the sunlight in the three-fold power of such light which gives warmth and light and life. Like the sun, the Holy Spirit quickens, heals, purifies, gladdens, strengthens. It has been said that the Holy Spirit is never represented as a dove except when it rests upon Christ. To sinful men he comes as a refining fire. But when we have been purged he comes to us also as a dove, for "the fruit of the Spirit is gentleness."

Christian Recreation*

NO charge has done more mischief to religion than that which represents it as making its followers gloomy. It could never have done so much harm if Christians had not unconsciously given a basis for it. It was the fault of the Pilgrim Fathers that they opposed all cheerfulness and merriment; that, as Macaulay says, they were opposed to bear-baiting, not because of the pain it gave the bear, but because of the pleasure it gave the man. The same tendency has alienated young people from the church, by making it appear that recreation of all kinds is sin. Boys and girls have consequently shrunk from it under the false impression that it robs life of its joys and renders it dull and gloomy. As a matter of fact religion enhances the joy of life and forbids nothing but amusements and pleasures which do harm and work mischief. There is nothing forbidden by religion which wise and farseeing parents would not also forbid on moral grounds.

No better service can be rendered by the Christian to the cause than showing an example of cheerfulness and participating in good honest sports. It is the evil, the wicked, the injurious that he should avoid, and this, if he were wise, he would avoid apart from religious motive. God never intended his people to be depressed or sorrowful; he intended them to enjoy life and he gave them abundant reason for such enjoyment. It is the business of every Christian to show that he has no occasion to go to the world for his pleasures and to prove that the aspersions on religion which represents it as dull and morose is false. To be earnest in work and earnest in play is possible, as every young man has found who has given himself willingly to the service of Christ.

Indwelling of the Spirit

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

IN this dispensation of the Spirit, our glory is God's indwelling. God's people of old were never called "the temple of the Holy Ghost," "the temple of the living God." The promise of the blessed Spirit is one of the most precious of God's promises; it runs throughout the Bible. It was given through Isaiah, "I will pour my Spirit upon thy seed, and my blessing upon thine offspring" (Isa. 44: 3); it was given through Ezekiel, "I will put my Spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes" (Ezek. 36: 27); it was given through Joel, "And it shall come to pass afterward ["in the last days"—Acts 2: 17], that I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh; and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, your old men shall dream dreams, your young men shall see visions; and also upon the servants and upon the hand-maids in those days will I pour out my Spirit" (Joel 2: 28, 29); and when John the Baptist came, as the forerunner of Jesus, he said, "I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance; but . . . he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire" (Matt. 3: 11).

Who knows what might not be given to the prayer of faith, if Christians, as a body, prayed "in the Holy Ghost"? "If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place; and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible unto you" (Matt. 17: 20). Paul was a man full of the Holy Ghost, and, discarding "enticing words of man's wisdom," he spoke "in demonstration of the Spirit and of power." Peter tells of those "that preached the Gospel unto you with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven." And yet, when a man is speaking by the Holy Ghost, or praying in the Spirit, he is not conscious of himself, or gratified by a sense of power. Every worker who knows anything of the power of the Holy Ghost knows how often, when we have had such consciousness of power, hardly any result has followed, but how often, when we have felt empty and powerless—almost dispirited with our lack of power—the Lord has done great things, and has thus shown us that conscious power is not always the power of the Holy Ghost.

The great need of the church in the present day is the power of the Holy Ghost; the great need everywhere, whether in work among the heathen, in missions, at home, in schools, or in families, is the need of the Holy Ghost. And yet, the Holy Ghost is given, he is in the world, he is in the church, he is in every believer. But is he recognized? Is each of us living as the temple of the Holy Ghost, really yielded to him as a house is to its owner, for his sole use? If not, let the deeds be made out, signed and sealed, let there be a definite, once-for-all yielding up to him of his property, and a definite acknowledgment of him as its Owner. Then things will come into order. Then God will be able to have full play in our being, and our life will begin to answer its true purpose, the life of Christ will begin to be manifest in our mortal bodies, and we shall become "a habitation of God through the Spirit."

It is a question of questions with many a child of God, "Have I received the Holy Ghost in his fulness?" First, let us notice, that Holy Scripture always recognizes the Holy Ghost as God: "Now the Lord is that Spirit. . . . Even as from the Lord the Spirit" (II. Cor. 3: 17, 18, R.V.), and always speaks of him as "he," not "it." Jesus is revealed to us as a real, living Person, a Person with whom we have to do, and just in the same way is the Holy Ghost, when we really receive him, revealed to us as a Person. The question, "Have I received him?" may best be answered by finding out from the Word what his office is, and then inquiring, "Is he fulfilling that office to me?"

20th Century Gideons

THE organization of Christian Commercial Travelers known as "The Gideons," is making preparations for an active campaign in New York City early in May. Field Secretary C. T. Bowers, of Nebraska, will speak at a number of meetings to be held in New York and Brooklyn churches and Y. M. C. Associations. Renewed interest in the traveling men of the country on the part of Christian people is expected to result. The first meeting will be the John Street Noonday Business Men's Meeting on Saturday, May 2, 12 to 1 o'clock. On Sunday, May 3, meetings will be held at Bedford Branch Y. M. C. A., 1121 Bedford Avenue, Brooklyn, at 4 o'clock P.M., and in the evening at the Embury M. E. Church, Decatur Street and Lewis Avenue, Brooklyn. On Sunday, May 10, Gideon meetings will be held in the Harlem Branch of the Y. M. C. A., 5 West One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street, at 4:30 P.M., and in the evening at 7:45 P.M., at West End Presbyterian Church, Rev. A. Edwin Keigwin, pastor. A mid-week prayer-meeting of Mt. Morris Baptist Church May 13, 8 P.M., Fifth Avenue, near One Hundred and Twenty-sixth Street.

With about 300,000 men engaged throughout the country in selling goods on "the road," it can readily be understood how great a power for good or evil such an organization can exert. The demands of business-to-day require energetic, efficient and enterprising men as salesmen, and as a result the moral status of the "road" is much higher than formerly. It is only during recent years that the Gideon type has become conspicuous. These men are engaged in the work of the day, yet find time evenings to do a lot of extra service in prayer-meetings and missions, and the emblem of the organization—a button representing the Gideon lamp and pitcher—is at all times an inspiration not only to the wearer, but to the observer.

Any one desiring information concerning the work, or a complete list of these special meetings, can secure the same by addressing the President, Mr. C. A. Brady, 66 Reade Street, New York City, or the Secretary, Mr. Thomas Amis, 473 West One Hundred and Forty-fifth Street. It is the aim of the organization to enroll in its ranks every Christian commercial traveler, and the co-operation of pastors and Christian workers is welcomed, and has been as a rule very freely accorded.

God's Gifts*

VERY broad and free are the promises God makes to his children in encouraging them to approach him in prayer. "Ask and it shall be given you," is a promise which has no bounds. Yet there are many who mistake its scope. Multitudes of Christians complain that they have besought God for gifts that they have never received. It is easy to perceive why prayers are often unanswered. It is presupposed that in approaching God the Christian is profoundly convinced of his superior wisdom as well as of his love. He should be in harmony with God desiring the highest and best gifts.

No parent would pledge himself to give to his little son, whatsoever that son might ask. The very fact of his loving his son so intensely would require him to refuse the child some of his requests. The boy might ask to spend his time in the playground instead of in school, but the father knows that for the boy's own sake such a request must be rejected. Then, too, if he is a wise father, who has studied his son's character, he knows that a gift granted to other children must be denied to him, because it might injure him. Yet it often happens that the poverty-stricken Christian wonders why his brother Christian has the wealth denied him.

In approaching the throne of God in prayer, the petition regularly offered by a well-known clergyman should always be made both in lip and heart: "Not according to any foolish wish of ours, but according to thy wisdom, as seems best to thee for our own good and the development of our own souls, do thou for us and enable us to say always, Thy will be done." The Christian offering such a prayer is never dissatisfied nor impatient, but is sure that his heavenly Father doeth all things well.

A COURSE IN ESPERANTO

LESSON No. 9.—By Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

What I See From My Windows

Mi loĝas en la urbo Vaŝingtono, nacia ĉefurbo de Usono. Mia domo havas multajn fenestrojn; tra ili mi vidas multajn aferojn. Mi vidas larĝan straton. Meze de la strato estas duobliga tramvojo. La tramoj estas verdaj kaj blankaj. Ĉiufanke de la tramvojo estas bulvaroj; meze de la bulvaroj estas vico da kverkoj. Kontraŭe estas vico da belaj butikoj. Mi senĉese vidas marsoldatojn preterirantajn, ĉar la ŝiparkorto estas proksime. Mi vidas ofte procesiojn da soldatoj kaj marsoldatoj.

Kvar preĝejoj estas videblaj; tri estas el brikoj, unu el ŝtono. La ŝtona preĝejo havas sonorilon. Mi vidas hospitalon kiu estas konstruita laŭ la arkitekturo Hispana. Multaj infanoj, blankaj kaj nigraj, trapasas la straton, irante al siaj lernejoj kaj revenante.

Mi vidas la belan montetaron de Virginio, malproksime trans la rivero. Mi rigardas dekstren laŭlonge de la strato kaj vidas la belan Kongresan Bibliotekon. Ĝi estas konstruita el blanka marmoro, kaj la kupolo estas orumita. Antaŭ la Biblioteko estas la Kapitolio. Ĝi estas larĝa kaj granda, la plej bela en la mondo. Maldekstre de la strato, inter la Kapitolio kaj la Biblioteko, mi vidas la novan Oficejo-konstruaĵon de la Kongreso, konstruita el blanka marmoro. Pretere estas la Mara Hospitalo. Ĝi estas konstruita el griza ŝtono. Malproksime mi vidas la monumenton starigitan je la gloro de Georgo Vaŝingtono. Mi povas vidi ankaŭ la Oficejon de Gravurado kaj la Muzeon.

Viro estis vidata hieraŭ havanta nur unu kruron. Sub lia sola piedo estis radetglitilo, kaj radeto sub lia lambastono. Li glitis rapide kune kun la tramvojo; li sin tenis flanke de la tramvagonoj.

With the help of the following vocabulary it should be possible for Esperanto students to translate and write out this exercise. The ability to do so depends upon remembering many words previously given, and applying rules as to the formation of the plural; also the accusative and possessive cases, tenses of verbs, etc. If translated in a Circle, let each member in turn take a word.

not received her letter then. Surely, surely, if . . .

And then the maid placed in her hand another cablegram. She tore it open, divining whence it came. It was from him. A few words:

"You know how I care," it read boldly, "that I would give anything to come back, but I am here and here I must stay. God help us both."

So he had received her letter after all! Would nothing shake the unbreakable resolution of this man? Might she pine and die there alone and awoken no response in that iron heart? She, too, walked her via dolorosa in that hour. She, too, rose from it purified as are all those who have gone through such painful ways of life until they have rested calmly on the cross.

He hoped that she might answer him, but nothing came from her. She never sent him a cablegram. Messages had come to him in floods from a world which rang with his heroism, but no word from her whose slightest whisper of approbation would have outweighed them all. His heart broke and broke. The half-yearly ship came at last, and even that brought no letter. He realized then what she had been to him. The food of heart which these letters had given him had kept him up. He saw then that without at least that much from her he could not go on. He would die in the wilderness.

He set his teeth and went about his work doggedly, but hope was dead, slain in his heart. He plunged into the wilds on the longest, most desperate journey of his history. And when he came back grimmer, older, more bent, more broken than ever before, he saw in the window of his hut through the Arctic night a light.

Painfully staggering to the door, he threw it open. And she was there, in all her youth, her beauty, her sweetness, before him; mute, tremulous, expectant, hands outstretched. He shrank back from her with upraised hand, appalled. He could not realize the fact at first.

"Is it you?" he asked when his choking heart let him find words.

"Even I," answered the woman. "Will you have me now?"

"Have you come to take me back?" asked the man, desperately fighting against himself.

She paused, hesitated, stepped nearer to him, her hand fell upon his shoulder, her face approached his own.

"No," she whispered, "I have come to stay here with you, to live with you, and to die with you, if that be our fate."

Dear Dr. Klopsch: The Calendar and Alexander book arrived yesterday. Am much pleased with both. They will give me great satisfaction.

6 Per Cent Bonds at Par

9 Miles From Denver, Colo.

begins an area of farming land stretching half way to the celebrated Greeley and Longmont region (the best known irrigation district in the world) which is the basis of an issue of bonds now owned and offered by us, viz:

6% Land Secured Bonds

due each year from 3 to 11 years. Principal and semi-annual interest payable at American Trust and Savings Bank, Chicago. Denominations — $100, $500, $1,000 (Orders accepted for single bonds) issued by the which company has acquired and merged into one system the properties of 9 active, operating, irrigation companies in the immediate vicinity of Denver, thus endueing the company with some of the earliest water rights in Colorado, dating back over 40 years—others 30 years.

These are rights or priorities to the direct river flow and also to the flood waters of the principal streams of the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains, and besides, tapping the Fraser, the principal river on the western slope. Water stored in reservoirs for use in the late summer when the streams fail is of inestimable value to sugar beets and other crops. Stored Water is Stored Wealth.

Security Under the Bonds

Primarily, mortgage liens on the Denver Reservoir Irrigation Company's system, including water rights, canals, reservoirs, sites, etc., and all properties now owned or hereafter to be acquired by the Company, conservatively estimated worth

Two Million to Three Million Dollars

Secondly, collateral security in the form of mortgage liens upon the lands to which the water is to be applied, derived from sales of reservoir stock representing water rights sufficient for the land, and by the water stock itself, which is not delivered to purchaser until he has completed his payment.

The farmer has ten years in which to pay for a perpetual water right at the rate of $50 per acre. The deed of trust securing the bonds provides that these mortgage liens given to secure the payment for water rights, shall be deposited with the American Trust & Savings Bank, Chicago, Trustee, in the ratio of one and one fourth times the amount of the bonds issued. The ratio must be maintained during the life of the bonds. The value of the collateral security herefore is stated as follows:

As security for every $1,000 bond the American Trust and Savings Bank holds $1,250 mortgage loans upon farm land estimated worth with water right $2,000, or security equal to THREE TIMES the amount of the bonds, in addition to the responsibility of the Company.

The Denver-Greeley District

This is said to be the richest agricultural community in the world, producing the highest quality of sugar beets, potatoes and other farm products.

These securities are unparalleled in attractiveness in the history of irrigation in the United States in the following respects:

FIRST, Location: Viz., immediately adjoining the city of Denver, the most beautiful city in the West—the capital of the State, the second largest city between the Mississippi River and the Pacific Coast, with over 200,000 people, twelve or fifteen railroad systems, constituting Denver the principal distributing point for the whole Rocky Mountain region, extending from Montana to northern Texas, affording a ready market for all that can be produced in a radius of many miles, giving a potential value to these lands beyond that of any irrigated section east of California.

SECOND, Comparative values: In other irrigated sections fruit lands command from $300 to $2,000 per acre; farming land from $100 to $350 per acre. These values exist in isolated and sparsely settled localities.

Adjoining the land in question on the south and west, the above prices prevail, but as a basis for estimating the value of the security under these bonds we have taken $200 per acre only as the land value. The actual selling price is considerably above this figure and advancing constantly.

Purpose of Bond Issue

These land mortgages are discounted to make available the funds of the Company for the further extension of its canals, and for the construction of the Standley Reservoir the largest and latest in the system. In other words, to realize within reasonable restrictions upon the assets of the Company.

Brain and Nerves Restored by Grape-Nuts Food

The number of persons whose ailments were such that no other food could be retained at all, is large and reports are on the increase.

"For 12 years I suffered from dyspepsia, finding no food that did not distress me," writes a Wis. lady. "I was reduced from 145 to 90 lbs., gradually growing weaker until I could leave my bed only a short while at a time, and became unable to speak aloud."

"Three years ago I was attracted by an article on Grape-Nuts and decided to try it. "My stomach was so weak I could not take cream, but I used Grape-Nuts with milk and lime water. It helped me from the first, building up my system in a manner most astonishing to the friends who had thought my recovery impossible."

"Soon I was able to take Grape-Nuts and cream for breakfast, and lunch at night, with an egg and Grape-Nuts for dinner."

"I am now able to eat fruit, meat and nearly all vegetables for dinner, but fondly continue Grape-Nuts for breakfast and supper."

"At the time of beginning Grape-Nuts I could scarcely speak a sentence without changing words around or 'talking crooked' in some way, but my brain and nerves have become so strengthened that I no longer have that trouble." A WALK AROUND OLD NINEVEH

"HE will make Nineveh a desolation, and dry like a wilderness, and flocks shall lie down in the midst of her . . . Every one that passeth by her shall hiss and wag his head." So sang the prophet Zephaniah, in his denunciation of the "exceeding great city" of the book of Jonah, which stood far away across the Arabian Desert, on the Tigris River. The words of the prophet were fulfilled, for in the year 606 B.C. Nineveh fell into the hands of the Medes and Persians, the people were killed or enslaved, the tall palaces were deserted, and the clay bricks of their walls turned back into the mud of which they were made. Thus Nineveh turned to barren mounds among which the herds of the shepherds sought shelter, and the passer-by wagged his head and hissed at the ruins of former greatness.

The last king of Nineveh was its greatest, for the city perished when at its height. Assurbanipal was his name. The Greeks, who called him Sardanapalus, told strange tales of how he painted his face like a woman, and passed his days spinning with his wives in the harem.

of clay, for the ancient classical writers have recorded little regarding the city but tradition. Though Nineveh is sometimes called one of the most ancient of cities, when compared with the cities of Babylonia it is comparatively modern. We are told in the Bible that

Goat-Skin Raft or "Kelek" on the Tigris

HOUSE + FISH = NINEVEH
i. e., "Nineveh, the House of Fish," or "Fishing Place"

Asshur built Nineveh, and recent excavations may confirm that statement. The Assyrians were but a colony of Babylonians who migrated north, up the Tigris River, and built a city of their own. They named their new city Asshur, but just why no one knows, unless the leader's name was Asshur. Perhaps that leader, from whom the city was named, became deified, as heroes frequently are in the Orient, and later he became the great national god of Assyria. If this is true, the god of Assyria was but a Biblical character who was exalted to that station by means of ancestral worship, which still exists in so many places. The ruins of Asshur, recently partially excavated by the Germans, may still be seen on the Tigris, half-way between Nineveh and Bagdad. From the city of Asshur the people went north and built Nineveh. The excavations, therefore, teach that the old Bible story is true, that Asshur built Nineveh. It is but one of the many instances of how even the earliest of Bible history is being confirmed at the present time.

About 2,000 B.C. Nineveh was a small hamlet, hardly worthy of the name of city. It was built where the Tigris River was fordable, and there the fish seemed to be abundant, for the word Nineveh means "a fish house." The group of wedges by which the ancient Assyrians wrote the name of the city is composed of the word for "house," with the word for "fish" in its interior. Here, in early times, the Assyrian kings who lived at Asshur had an armory, and here they stored their weapons where they were easily available in case of war. For the first 1,500 years of its existence Nineveh was a small village or fishing hamlet. During that long period, the Assyrian kings lived at Asshur and Nimrud, until finally, in the year 122, King Sargon of the Bible—the king who captured Samaria—built the city of Khorsabad, north of Nineveh. In the year 705 Nineveh first became a royal residence, for Sinacherib, the king who besieged Jerusalem in the time of Hezekiah, built the

The Hebrews called him Osnappar, and in the book of Ezra he is mentioned as great and noble. It was this king who made Nineveh as great and beautiful as any city in the ancient Orient. Though the Greeks called him effeminate, the ruins of his marvelous palace, the sculptured alabaster slabs which adorned it, the enormous collection of the clay books of his library which have been uncovered during the past fifty years, justify the title, "great and noble," which the Hebrews gave him.

It is only in recent years that the real history of Nineveh has been deciphered from the Assyrian books first walls which Nineveh ever had. There he constructed his magnificent palace, and there the ruins of both the walls and the palace still remain. In one of his inscriptions King Sinacherib says:

I greatly enlarged the site of Nineveh: its outer and inner walls, which before my time did not exist, I built and made as high as a mountain. The surrounding country, which for lack of water was a desert, I irrigated. I brought water to the city for the people to drink. . . . I enlarged the dwellings of Nineveh and widened its streets, which were too narrow. I made it brilliant like the sun.

Jesus Only

TEXT—I. Cor. 1: 23, 24

"We preach Christ crucified . . . the power of God and the wisdom of God"

THIS was harder for St. Paul to say than it is for us. Nineteen hundred years ago people knew not of any glory connected with the Cross. Its whole history was one of shame and humiliation. To-day it glitters in jewels on the breast of beauty; shines like burnished gold on the domes of earth's proudest cathedrals; is lifted high over the temples of trade and the marts of commerce; is the central object in our million-peopled cities; is the harbinger of mercy and help upon the bloody battlefields; furnishes sanctuary and protection to those who rest beneath its shadow. It is the symbol of all that is holiest and best in our Christian history, and men beneath its sign have gone forth to conquer barbarism and transform it into Christianity.

It is the apex of our civilization, and as we survey the ruins of empires, the graves of dynasties, the tombs of kings and the wrecks of rulers,

In the Cross of Christ we glory,
Towering o'er the wrecks of time;
All the light of sacred story
Gathers round its head sublime.

But in St. Paul's time it was the symbol merely of meanness and degradation—the most torturing instrument for punishing the greatest criminals and exacting the last penalty of the broken law. It represented what the gallows, gibbet and electric chair would to-day. Its associations were all of criminal baseness.

And yet, in spite of all this, Paul, knowing so much of the past, present and prospective history of Him who hung thereon, said: "God forbid that I should glory save in the Cross of our Lord Jesus Christ"; and while the Jews asked for a sign, and the Greeks sought after wisdom, he preached Christ crucified, to the Jews a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks foolishness, but to them that believe, the power of God and the wisdom of God.

In opening our metropolitan pastorate and announcing our motto, "A Banner Year for Bedford Street," we use as the keynote of our ministry these words of St. Paul as fitting the needs of America in the twentieth century, as they did those of Corinth in the first century.

Corinth was a city of commerce, trade and sinful luxury. Its inhabitants were the votaries of pleasure and worshipers of mammon. Paul had come to it in the course of his second foreign missionary journey. In obedience to the heavenly vision, he had "come over into Macedonia to help" them, and carried the Gospel torch from Asia to Europe. He met, however, but a rough reception. In Philippi he was cast into the inner prison, and his feet thrust into the stocks. When his great Master came to earth his first cradle was the manger, and when his messenger entered Europe one of his first bedrooms was a jail. After Philippi followed experiences with "lewd fellows of the baser sort in Thessalonica," the scorn and contempt of the Greeks in cultured Athens, and afterwards the longer sojourn and more successful ministry in Corinth.

There he found the Jews as usual conducting the city's finances, the Greeks arguing and disputing all manner of questions, and the imperial Roman, scornful alike of merchant and thinker, believing, like Pistol, that the world was his oyster, which, with his sword, he would open, its lands and cities marked out for conquest, and himself their conqueror. To all of them Paul preached the one Gospel of Jesus Christ, and him crucified. The Jews hated and despised him; the Greeks scorned and derided him; the Roman looked on him with proud indifference; but every evening this mean-looking, undersized, weak-eyed Hebrew Christian gathered together a few people in an upper room and preached to them Jesus and the resurrection.

He hadn't a large audience. There was the poor slave enjoying an hour's cessation from service; the longshoreman with a respite from the task of loading and unloading the ships in the harbor; the soldier with a short furlough for rest and refreshment; the poor woman escaping for an hour from household drudgery; "not many learned, not many noble, not many wise or mighty ones"; but to the foolish, base and weak ones Paul unfolded the manifold wisdom of the ages, and preached the world's Redeemer.

All these classes have their successors in the society of to-day. We have still men who, like the Jews, ask for a sign or wonder. We have still Greeks who sneer at the Cross, and seek in old or new philosophy some other solution of the mysteries of life and death. They would rather construct some new system than accept the divine revelation; and there, alas! are others, the larger number, who, in their sinful indifference, are content with conquering the world and laying tribute on its products for their personal use. To all these classes represented in New York we have but the Pauline message to preach Christ crucified, the power and wisdom of God.

We have sometimes been asked what we think about a New Creed, New Thought and New Theology. Of these we have not any to present. There are enlarged views of truth. Every year, by its inventions and discoveries, broadens the spheres of observation and induction. There are new methods of Christian labor and influence. The truth itself, like the diamond, has many facets; and the preacher's toil, like the lapidary's cutting, should release the hidden scintillations of light and beauty. But the fundamental facts of our holy religion were settled centuries ago. It is our greatest duty and highest privilege to preach the glad Gospel of the Saviour's love. Others may speculate and dream and argue and philosophize and grope through darkness up to God. We preach Christ crucified, the words of his opponents. The Lord Jesus Christ announced as his own prophetic work "preaching the acceptable year of the Lord," and he taught it with authority. "Never man spake like this man." This was the apostles' commission and has always been the glory of the Protestant churches, as opposed to the ritualism and sacerdotalism of the Romish churches. They have provided music galore, have burned incense as a sweet smelling savor, have illuminated their altars with wax candles, have bowed the knee as the bell announced the elevation of the baked piece of flour and water manufactured but yesterday and adored as a new-created Christ.

Protestantism, on the contrary, has elevated the pulpit and declared a divine and spiritual message reaching the soul rather than the senses, and appealing to the conscience as God's vicegerent in the worshiper. This difference in the churches is indicated in their construction. Some writers on church architecture contend that the altar, choir, pulpit and chancel constitute the church proper, the nave where the people assemble being merely an addendum, long or short, broad or narrow, as convenience may dictate. Protestants, on the contrary, assert that the pulpit, whence the power of living men is brought to bear on living men, should occupy the most prominent position, while the true church is the company of believers. Salvation by faith, rather than by a proper administration of the sacraments, should be the prime object of the preacher's labors. We have heard such buildings scoffed at by sacerdotalists as "houses of preaching" rather than "houses of prayer," but the divine commission is to preach the Gospel to every creature, and in fulfilling it we but tread in the footsteps of our Lord and his apostles.

And what a goodly band of preachers has the Church produced! From Chrysostom the silver-tongued to Aquinas the angelic doctor the leaders of the early Church were its preachers of the Gospel. Martin Luther, of Germany, shook the world by his thundering appeals for reformation, while Calvin, in Switzerland; Lefevre, in France, and John Knox, in Scotland, made monarchs tremble as they discoursed of righteousness, temperance and the judgment to come.

Honest Hugh Latimer, in England, severely rated the "non-preaching prelates" of his day for their failure to fulfil what he considered their principal function. John Wesley traveled over his world-parish preaching as he went from Epworth Tombstone and Gwennap Pit, and from every coign of vantage he proclaimed the sweet Evangel.

Under George Whitefield's matchless sacred eloquence the cheeks of begrimed miners showed the furrowed channels of the flood of tears, and even the polite Chesterfield, startled from his incognito, shouted to arrest the sinner on the brink of the pit of doom. In later times men that have moved the world for God were not sacerdotalists, but preachers like Guthrie, Spurgeon, Parker, Punshon, Farrar and the grand old man, General Booth, of the Salvation Army. And America has been by no means in the rear. Our own hills and prairies have re-echoed similar appeals to heart and conscience from Roger Williams, Jonathan Edwards and Charles G. Finney, and of a later date, Moody, Beecher, Phillips Brooks, Fowler and Talmage, and many more too numerous to mention.

"He's only a preacher," say some. Only a preacher! But what an only! It is a work which an archangel would delight to do, but which God, in his wisdom, has delegated to human hearts and human lips and human tongues, and of which he used the cloven tongue of fire as his pentecostal qualification. Is it any wonder we magnify our office and rejoice to preach to our own generation Jesus Christ and him crucified? for that must always be the staple of our message. Although, like Lord Bacon, we take all knowledge to be our own, and ransack ancient and modern literature for illustrations; although we strive to keep time with the majestic tread of modern invention and discovery; although, with reverent eye, we peer behind the unveiling of nature's secrets, and hail with rapture the disclosures of modern scholarship; although poesy lends her wings, and imagination soars her flight beyond the stars, we recognize that in the vanguard of our civilization, solving the soul's deepest problems, fullest revelation of the Father's love and the Son's self-sacrifice, of which the Holy Spirit delights to bear a present testimony.

Webster defines preaching as the "declaration of a message," a "crying out in public," and a preacher is the herald or messenger of God. It is his duty not to originate a system, but to declare a truth. When Jonah went to Nineveh a second time the divine instruction was: "Arise, go unto Nineveh, that great city, and preach unto it the preaching that I bid thee." It is the preacher's duty, as it was that of the prophets, not to construct a message, but to deliver it with the authoritative "Thus saith the Lord." These olden prophets felt it in their inmost soul and it bubbled forth in the divine formula. Had the human mind the construction of its own history or fiction, the Saviour would have been made to soar into the heaven of heavens at the apotheosis of his earthly glory from Mount Hermon when his face shone like the sun, and his raiment was white and glistening, and he was transfigured before his favored apostles in the company of Moses and Elijah. But though they thus beheld and spoke afterwards of his glory, the burden of their message was not the glory of Mount Hermon, but the tragedy of Calvary and the higher glory of the resurrection of the dead. If the demand of the people nowadays is for short sermons, sensational sermons, up-to-date sermons, semi-secular sermons, the rostrum and the platform are open for the orator to declare his own message, but from the pulpit of the Christian Church the "foolishness of preaching" is to make men wise unto salvation.

But this preaching is no mere foolish work. In using the phrase the apostle was only quoting the

A WALK AROUND OLD NINEVEH

The Palace of Sinacherib (as restored by Layard)

City of Mosul, on the Tigris, Opposite Ancient Site of Nineveh

Thus Nineveh in the year 705 B.C. became a royal city. From that time to the end of the Assyrian empire, in 606, Nineveh was the home of its kings. In all the ancient world of that period, there was not a city which could compare with it in grandeur; but the history of Nineveh as the home of royalty was as brief as it was brilliant. Just a hundred years after its walls and its first royal palaces were built, the city turned into the vast mounds which mark its site and form a monument worthy of it.

Nineveh speedily turned to mounds because it was built of sun-dried bricks. According to the custom of ancient days, the conqueror of a city killed or enslaved the people, and forbade any one to occupy or even to approach its site. Therefore, the deserted houses, uncared for, turned again to the mud of which they were built, and whatever remained in the palaces and temples after the soldiers had sacked them, was soon buried and protected by the covering of dirt above. There the treasures have remained for the modern archaeologist to excavate; the name "Nineveh" was soon forgotten, excepting by the natives who lived about them. But the city was not always to remain forgotten. About 116 A.D. a town was erected upon the ruins, and Roman coins bearing the name Nineveh were struck; even now the coins are picked up in the ruins.

In 627 A.D. the famous battle of Nineveh was fought by the Roman Heraclius with the Persian Chosroes. A century later, a Christian named Isaac was made a bishop of Nineveh, and several monasteries were built upon the mound, of which one was dedicated to the prophet Jonah. The life of the second Nineveh was also short, for the Arabs and Tartars burned the monasteries, killed the inhabitants, and built the fort of Ninawi among the ruins. Finally, the little Arab village of Nebi Yunus grew upon the summit of one of the mounds, and on the opposite shore appeared the large modern town of Mosul.

Concerning the size of ancient Nineveh, the early writers disagreed; but no ancient city, when compared with our modern towns, could be called extensive. The Book of Jonah describes Nineveh as a city of three days' journey; three days might have been required if one were to walk through all its streets. Diodorus, an early writer, says that Nineveh was sixty miles in circumference; others describe it as considerably less. However, the walls of the city are still standing, and the modern traveler may ride about their summit in about three hours, for the entire circuit is but eight miles. Their greatest height is forty-six feet. The enclosure within the walls, about three miles long, and with an average width of one mile, covers 1,800 acres. Nineveh was indeed an enormous city for ancient times, far larger than Babylon or Jerusalem.

Within the wall of Nineveh are two huge mounds, in which are buried the palaces of the Assyrian kings. The larger or northern mound, now called Koyunjik, covers 100 acres, and it is said that 1,000 men working for 120 years would be required to excavate it. The southern mound is called Nebi Yunus, a modern Arabic name which means the prophet Jonah. In the little Arab village upon its summit stands a Moslem tomb in which Jonah is said to be buried. The remaining space within the city is now cultivated by the modern Arabs, literally fulfilling the prophecy that "flocks shall lie down in the midst of her."

In 1842, the French government stationed Mr. Botta as consul at Mosul, with instructions to dig into the ancient ruins. When he began his excavations he found nothing to reward him. An Arab, who was watching the work, suggested that if he would find antiquities, he should go to the ruins of Khorsabad, eighteen miles to the north. Mr. Botta accompanied the Arab, and found the wonderful palace of the Biblical king Sargon. Layard, a young Englishman, while hunting in the country, became interested in the work of the French, and in the year 1845, with funds given him by the British Ambassador at Constantinople, he began to excavate at Nineveh where the French had failed.

The story of the uncovering of the palaces at Nineveh is a fascinating one. Many men have taken part in those excavations. Layard conducted two expeditions; he was followed by Rassam and George Smith; last of all, Mr. King, of the British Museum, has recently been digging among the old palaces. The excavators have been wonderfully successful, for the ruins are a vast storehouse of treasures. In the mound of Koyunjik, Layard discovered the palaces of the Biblical kings, Sinacherib and Assurbanipal. The walls, still standing, were lined with the beautiful sculptured slabs which now decorate the British Museum. The accompanying inscriptions speak of the wars which the Hebrews described in the Bible. In the palace of Assurbanipal was the magnificent library of 100,000 books of clay, and in the wedge-shaped writing with which they were covered, we read the history, religion, literature, the business transactions, the law cases, the wills, the school-boy exercises and even the dictionaries of the Ninevites. Fifty years ago, it was not known who the great Osnappar of the Book of Ezra was; but now he is one of the best known kings of history, and his biography may be found upon the shelves of nearly every well-equipped library.

The southern mound of Nineveh is by far the most interesting unexplored ruin in Mesopotamia. The treasures which are buried there must be of the greatest value to the Bible student. Because the tomb of Jonah and a Moslem cemetery stand upon the summit of the mound, excavations there have never been permitted by the Turks. Once a Moslem who owned a bit of land on the mound, wished to build a house, and Mr. Layard offered to dig the cellar, if he might have whatever antiquities he should discover. Few have ever possessed a larger cellar than did this Moslem, for it reached far into the ground, deep enough to reveal the palace of the Biblical king Esarhaddon. The walls of the palace, still standing, are lined with sculptured slabs of marble and alabaster, and with the Assyrian inscriptions which record the chief events in the life of this Biblical king. In the soil beneath the so-called tomb of Jonah and the squalid huts of the Moslem Arabs, the magnificent palace must lie, until permission to uncover it may be obtained.

Jonah's tomb is so sacred to the Moslems, that as yet only two Christians have succeeded in reaching its interior. Of course, Jonah was not buried there; for the city was still flourishing more than a century after the prophet died. A monastery dedicated to him did, however, stand near the ruins, and the later Moslems who obtained possession of the Christian building supposed that the prophet, whose name it bore, must have been buried there.

The city of Mosul on the opposite shore of the Tigris is interesting to the Bible student, not only because it represents Nineveh, but chiefly because the modern inhabitants live as did the poorer people of the ancient city. The peasants still irrigate the land along the river by drawing the water up in camel skins and allowing it to flow into their gardens. The people still float down the stream on the goat-skin raft or kelek, and they live in the same flat-roofed and poorly ventilated huts built of sun-dried bricks. The streets are narrow and dirty, and the only water supply is the river. The present population is about 40,000 Arabs, Christians and Jews. Though Arabic is the modern language and the Paganism of Assyria has given way to Mohammedanism, yet as one wanders along the gardens by the river's edge, or loiters about the bazaars, it requires little imagination to fancy that he is still in the old city of Asshur, and of Jonah and of Sinacherib and of the great and noble Osnappar. JESUS ONLY ~ SERMON BY REV. WM. POTTS GEORGE, D.D. CONTINUED and illuminating the darkness that gathers round the grave, there still marches in sublime majesty the Man of Nazareth. And Calvary's Cross and Joseph's empty tomb declare with no uncertain sound that he is the Resurrection and the Life, and has brought life and immortality to light by his Gospel.

We preach Christ crucified. The world is still hungry for this message, and to perishing multitudes it is the bread of life and the water of life. Said a regular worshiper to me once: "If you preachers only knew how we desire and hunger for Christ you would preach him more. Our pastor has just returned from an all-world tour, and we have heard to repletion about foreign populations and their heathen teachers, Brahma, Buddha, Confucius, Mohammed and Laotze. We want Christ! Nothing will satisfy us but Christ! We are hungry for Christ! Worn and wearied, burdened and heavy-laden, perplexed, troubled and sorrowful, we need Christ! Without him we die! With him we live eternally." Is it any wonder we preach Christ crucified? To preach Christ crucified with any dignified relation to the subject cannot be done by the reading of a moral essay, nor the delivery of a ten-minute sermonette. Sermonette, preacherette, churchette and Christianette generally go together, and from the unscriptural alliance may the good Lord deliver us. Whatever the Bible road or avenue selected, its outcome should be Calvary, and its issue Olivet, the mounts of Crucifixion and Ascension.

It is possible to tickle the ears with flights of rhetoric, and to occupy the time by discussing petty problems, while the weightier matters are untouched, and the soul goes home hungry for spiritual food. Some things are good for students, but the preacher's general congregation is in large measure composed of men and women with real needs, real sins, real sorrows and real hopes. To them Christ crucified brings the revelation of atonement, and from atonement, pardon, and from pardon, reconciliation, and from reconciliation, salvation, and from salvation certainty for time and a lively hope for eternity. What Christ crucified means, we can never fully solve. The nineteen hundred years' experience and history of multitudes in every land and clime bear witness that to "those who believe" it has been the "power of God and the wisdom of God." It is the power or dynamite of God which has made "hell's foundations quiver," and earth's foundations to be settled on the Rock of Ages. It is the wisdom of God, inasmuch as it has satisfied the longings of the leaders of the human race, and ministered equally to the needs of the millions who have set to their seals that God is true. It touches humanity at every point. It furnishes material for man's speculative intellect, and satisfies the deepest yearnings of his soul. It rejuvenated the nations at its beginning, and has been the greatest factor in their historic progress since. It has changed the names of Europe and America into Christendom, and is the world's mightiest moral and spiritual force today. Christ crucified has taught humanity the sublimest lessons of self-sacrifice, while, as a revelation of divine love, it has changed the whole aspect of the relations between God and man. It has shown the Father in the face of Jesus his Son.

His only righteousness I show,
His saving truth proclaim:
Tis all my business here below
To cry, "Behold the Lamb."

Now, if we preach Christ crucified, won't you believe it? If you believe it, won't you act as though you believed it now? Will you, renouncing and forsaking sin, accept it honestly, earnestly, truthfully, without doubt or questioning, now? Then you are saved; you must be saved. Christ was crucified for you to wash your sins away.

Then let us sit beneath his Cross
And gladly catch the healing stream,
All things for him account but loss
And give up all our hearts to him.
Of nothing think or speak beside,
My Lord, my Love is crucified.

NORTHFIELD'S GATHERING HOSTS

DIVINES FROM MANY LANDS TO LEAD
THE STUDENTS THE COMING SUMMER

The Mill Stream Rapids

AMONG the many beautiful towns that dot the green banks along the Massachusetts reach of the Connecticut River, none seem to have been more favored by Dame Nature than Northfield, which lies in that picturesque region almost at the intersection of Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Vermont. The river winds away from it to the north and south, and the hills that shut the village in are lofty enough in some places to be called mountains. Notch Mountain and its "Cathedral Pines" is a picture which lingers long in the memory of those fortunate enough to pass a few happy summer days in the encampment whose white tents gleam from among the green boughs during the conferences which have become such a feature of Northfield life.

Dwight L. Moody was born in the village and his grave is on the beautiful crest of Round Top, the spot he loved so well, and where he and his co-workers in the early days of his meetings at Northfield used to gather for the interchange of ideas and to sing the evening hymns. The buildings of Northfield Seminary are now conspicuous in the landscape, and their number is constantly growing. A beautiful chapel in the English Gothic style is now in the course of erection, the gift of Mrs. Russell Sage, of New York City. Mrs. Sage has also given the money to build a music hall for the musical department of the seminary. Some distance away is Mount Hermon School for young men, and here Holbrook Hall, the new administration building, is now nearing completion, and makes a fine addition to the structures already in use on the Mount Hermon campus.

People who knew the Northfield schools a few years ago would be surprised at the great progress made within a comparatively short period of time. Spring and summer are filled with interesting conferences that are attended by people from almost all over the United States, while many come from Canada and Great Britain.

In addition to those who come for instruction and study, there is an ever-increasing number of summer visitors who seek the rest and physical regeneration that comes from the days spent in the open air, tramping about the beautiful paths and roads that wind along the riverside, or cut back into the mysteries of the hills.

The village itself is historic, and around its shaded streets and colonial homesteads lingers many a fascinating bit of legend and romance.

Starting with the commencement week at Mount Hermon School, which began on April 18, events follow one another thick and fast at this great student and conference centre. The Mount Hermon Commencement was one of the best ever held at that famous school, and a fine body of seniors was graduated and sent out well armed mentally and physically for the conflict that awaits all young men of ambition and high purpose. The address at the commencement exercises was by Dr. John M. Thomas, President-elect of Middlebury College.

The second week of June will be commencement week at Northfield Seminary for young women. Rev. Robert Johnson, D.D., is coming down from Montreal to deliver the address to the graduating class. In addition, there will be a sacred concert, a chorus recital by the young ladies of the school, for Northfield is noted for its love of good music and receptions and exercises by the senior class. Northfield never appears more beautiful than during commencement week. All nature seems to put on the best appearance to add to the festal air of the town and school.

Hardly will the students of the seminary have packed their belongings and Round Top, near the grave of Moody; special Bible classes, missionary institutes, meetings of students' delegations and services of song. On July 4 there is always a big patriotic celebration that is always greatly enjoyed by both spectators and participants. The students always invent a new and attractive programme for this day as an appropriate finish to a delightful outing among these hills. During the conference there is time found for baseball games between teams from the different colleges and tennis tournaments.

Among the well-known speakers at the conference will be Rev. Anson Phelps Stokes, Jr., Mr. Robert E. Speer, Mr. F. S. Brockman, and President Falconer.

From July 16 to the 20th, the Women's Home Missionary Conference will be held. On July 18 the first session of the Summer School for Sunday School Workers will have its opening session. The Summer School for Women's Foreign Missionary Societies is from July 21 to 28 inclusive. On July 31 the General Conference of Christian Workers will open to last until the middle of August. W. R. Moody will preside and the musical programme will be in charge of Mr. George C. Stebbins and Mr. Charles M. Alexander. The list of speakers is a long one, and includes Rev. Hugh Black, of New York; Rev. R. A. Torrey, Rev. James E. Freeman, Rev. A. T. Pierson, D.D., Rev. C. A. R. Janvier and Rev. W. B. Macleod. This closes the regular conferences for the year, but lectures will be given and classes held at the Northfield schools covering all phases of to giving a regular course in the summer school on "Christ in the New Testament." Mr. Holden is an inspiring teacher, and was one of the most popular speakers at the General Conference at Northfield last summer. Rev. John Timothy Stone, of the Brown Memorial Presbyterian Church in Baltimore, Md., comes to give his first course at Mount Hermon. The course will have the general title of "Paul the Apostle to the City." Mr. Stone finds in the work of Paul many helpful suggestions as to ways of meeting the great problems of city life to-day.

"Fundamental Virtues in Manhood as Illustrated by Biblical Biography" is the course to be given by Rev. Baily Edwards, of Brooklyn. Mr. Edwards is the associate pastor of the South Congregational Church in the city of churches, and his experience has been such as to enable him to give a course of great practical value. He is at present President of the Brooklyn Sunday School Union. He has often spoken to Northfield audiences during various conferences, but this is the first time he has come as a regular instructor in the summer work. Mr. David McConaughy, Rev. E. F. Hallenbeck, D.D., and Dr. R. Erdman, D.D., are other well-known speakers and teachers who will appeal to all in getting practical knowledge in methods of Christian work.

Mr. McConaughy, it will be remembered, is the secretary of the Forward Movement of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. His books on Bible study are widely read and have made for him many strong friends. His topic will be "The Most Vital of Life Problems." Doctor Hallenbeck is the associate pastor of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church of New York City, and has been prominently identified with the Christian Endeavor Movement. Dr. Erdman is a member of the faculty of the Theological Seminary of Princeton University. He will lecture on "Character Sketches for Christian Workers."

All visitors are welcome to Mount Hermon School at the summer term, and they are enabled to see the practical working out of Mr. Moody's far-seeing educational ideas.

scattered for the summer vacation to their homes in almost every State in the Union, when other students, representing the young men of the Eastern colleges and preparatory schools, will assemble for the Student Conference. This conference is perhaps the best known to the general public, for the enthusiastic young men have gone back to their school after each conference and urged their fellow-students to go to a Northfield Conference at the first opportunity. The purpose of this conference is to "quicken the spiritual life of the students, and to train them to lead the organized work of their institutions." The first meetings will be held on June 26, and the last session on July 5. Work and play are mingled in invigorating proportions. On the daily schedule are meetings in the great auditorium, and on the crest of beautiful Christian work for about two months longer. Many attendants at the conference wait over to attend these.

The faculty for the summer course in Bible study and in training for Christian work is one of the strongest ever gathered at Northfield. Rev. Charles W. Heisler, D.D., pastor of the First Lutheran Church, of Albany, N. Y., comes back for the third time. This year he will deal especially with the Gospel in Hebrews. Among the topics on which he will lecture are: "The Better Revelation," "The Better Son," "The Better Prophet," "The Better High Priest," "The Better Covenant" and several others.

Rev. J. Stuart Holden, rector of St. Paul's Church in Portman Square, West London, is one of the clergymen from abroad who will attend the summer conference and deliver addresses in addition

CHINA'S STUDENT MIGRATION

Thousands of her Young Men and Many Koreans Visiting Japan to Learn the Secret of her Greatness

ONE of the strongest evidences of the great spiritual awakening now going on in China is found in the recent surprising development of Y. M. C. A. work in that country. Although it is yet hardly seven years since the work obtained a foothold in the Celestial Empire, it has progressed and expanded amazingly, and far exceeded the expectations of its founders. In Shanghai, the leading Association has a membership of about 500, which includes many Chinese bankers, merchants, officials, professional men, students, teachers and translators, besides a goodly sprinkling of the lower working classes. The Shanghai Association, a few months ago, erected a beautiful new building, which it is now occupying. In other Chinese cities, the Association movement is making strong headway.

Another evidence of the new life which China is developing, spiritually and intellectually, is the earnest search for light that is now being made by the Chinese student classes, no longer against the opposition, but rather with the approval of the Chinese literati and the officials. Not long ago several thousands of Chinese students visited Japan on the occasion of the dedication of a Chinese Y. M. C. A. building in Tokyo. Many of these students are Christians and members of the Chinese Y. M. C. A. They went to Japan for two reasons, viz.: to learn something of the civilization of the wonderful people, and secondly, to get in touch with the Japanese Y. M. C. A. They were a lot of fine-looking, bright young fellows, these Chinese visitors who went to Tokyo. One good-sized party went under the chaperonage of the Rev. Mr. Williams and Mr. J. W. Clinton, two well-known Christian workers. Their experience in Japan has been a revelation in many ways, and they will return to their homeland full of new ideas, and inspired by a vision of new and enlarged possibilities.

In an address delivered by a Christian Chinaman at the dedication in Tokyo, the speaker said: "The students head the list of four classes of people that constitute our nation. For thousands of years they have had the reins of government in their hands. It is the same in China now. How important then is the training of this class that is destined to exert such a commanding influence in the future, not only in the history of their own country, but that of the East. The coming, therefore, of such a large number to Japan is a matter of great significance."

In a report on this subject, Mr. John R. Mott writes: "The most striking fact in the student world in recent years has been the migration of such large numbers of Chinese students to the capital city of Japan. In the history of the world, there has been no such extensive migration of students from one land to another in so short a period. Here we find not several hundreds, but several thousands of young men who have come out from the proudest nation, the most conservative nation—aptly called the 'Walled Kingdom'—to sit at the feet of their conqueror, in order to learn the secret of her progress and power.

"These students come from every province of China. The motives actuating them are various. Some have degree men. Very few come over to Japan as Christians. While in China, most of them were not only non-Christian, but even anti-Christian. They are in the midst of influences tending to materialism, to extreme radicalism, and to gross immorality. They are cut off largely from the good influences which might come from the Japanese, because they have little knowledge of the Japanese language. They are exposed to the active forces of agnosticism and scepticism. There is a general tendency to throw off all religious restraint.

"The Young Men's Christian Association was the first agency to recognize the urgent need of putting forth special efforts to help these young men who were thrown as strangers in the midst of a strange city. Remarkable success attended these efforts. Two strong associations were built up, each with a membership of over 500. Points of contact with the Chinese students were established by means of night classes, courses of lectures, reading rooms and many other practical means of helpfulness. The confidence and sympathy thus won, opened the doors for the propagation of Christian truth. From the beginning, there has been in the pathway of these unselfish efforts an unbroken line of genuine conversions to the Christian faith. The conference of the World's Student Christian Federation afforded a rare opportunity for leaders in Christian work among students of many lands to bring to bear the influence of their Christian message and personality upon these representative young men of China. Of 3,000 Chinese students who heard their appeals, 250 publicly avowed their purpose to become disciples of Christ. A church has been organized with sixty members, and many others are being instructed preparatory for baptism. Who can measure what it will mean to transform these men from enemies to friends and propagators of the Christian faith? Without doubt the key to China is in Tokyo, and that key is in the hands of the Chinese students who are to furnish the leaders of that mighty nation of four hundred millions of people."

There are also about 500 Korean students in Tokyo, of whom fifty are supported by the Korean Government, and the rest by their families or themselves. The superintendent, who is employed by the Korean Government, is a strong Christian man, and is lending his influence and assistance to the Korean Young Men's Christian Association. A Christian Korean has been secured to work among them, and has met with much success. When he first came, in November 1906, there were but six Christians in the whole number; but with such energy and faith has he worked that there is now a permanent Bible Class of more than 120 earnest believers.

come out of mere curiosity; others have come with earnest and sincere desire to learn what Japan has to teach. It is doubtless true that practically all of these students are more or less animated with the patriotic desire to prepare themselves to do something for China. They have been drawn largely from the highest and best classes in China. Many of them have had good training in Chinese literature, and among them are not a few

MISSIONARY WORK IN RUSSIAN PRISONS

THE Rev. Adam Podin, a personal friend of Baron Woldemar Uxkull, of Russia, was converted about seventeen years ago in London, England, at the Sailors' Mission conducted by Miss Child. He now lives in the neighborhood of Baron Uxkull's castle in the little city of Kegel, province of Esthonia, Russia.

Last year he visited some of the worst prisons in Russia. In one he found 1,440 inmates of various classes and nationalities, many of them under sentence of death, and others waiting to be taken to Siberia or the Caucasus, to which they will be banished for life. Many of these are political prisoners, and not criminals in the ordinary sense. Mr. Podin says, in a recent letter: "To see such a crowd of men, women and children is an awful sight. About 200 or 300 is the average audience I get, most of them in irons and chains—men and women who, like us, once enjoyed liberty and freedom, but for whom now, as far as this world is concerned, all is over. Everything has gone wrong, opportunities lost, lives mis-spent, and nothing to look forward to but a dark eternity. But, praise the Lord! I have permission to preach to them, and He has wonderfully blessed my work, the last meetings especially. At one meeting, one of the men came running towards me, and as he ran, a soldier stood in his way with a bayonet pointed at his breast, thinking he was going to harm me, but the poor man cried out: 'Oh! I was not going to hurt him. I only wanted to know if it is all true what he said! Who is he? Can I depend on what he says? Can I really believe him?'

"Again I stepped to the front with this message: 'The words are true; I am telling the truth! If the Lord had not saved me I would have been as bad as any man in this prison.' Then I explained how the Lord saved me, and that he could save any and all of them if they believed on Christ as Saviour, Lord and King. You should have seen their faces as they were taken back to their cells, some smiling, others weeping, others reading the New Testaments given them. As an accompaniment to the joy and sorrow the clank, clank, clank of the iron and chains as they dragged along the floor. Some of them, just one hour or two before death, have given themselves to the Saviour, fully trusting and believing His precious promises. In Siberia and the Caucasus also, many are trusting in the Lord."

Our New Serial Story

TWO weeks hence, in our issue of May 20, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will begin the publication of a new serial, for which we predict a popularity as great as that which marked the appearance last year of Miss Eleanor Porter's beautiful story, "Into Still Waters." In that realistic tale of child life in the slums of New York, the author related the remarkable adventures of "Mag of the Alley," which were followed by our readers with lively and sympathetic interest.

In the new story, entitled "The Transformation of Margaret," Miss Porter has given us the sequel to her earlier tale, and it is a rarely attractive one, with a thousand wonderful and stirring situations. That sprite of mischief, Mag, though she has been restored to her home, cannot forget her alley playmates or her prankish ways. The reader meets some of the old alley acquaintances, too, including of course the Whalens, Bobby McGinnis and Patty, and the twins. We have more than a passing glimpse of the terrible evil of child labor, with its consequent misery. There is also a pleasing reminder of Mont-Lawn, our Children's Home, within whose happy precincts Mag—then a little slum guest—first learned the real secret of her identity.

But we will not anticipate the story, with its delightful surprises. We prefer that our readers should find out for themselves just what happened. Let every reader pass along the announcement to friends, so that the enjoyment of the forthcoming serial may be as widely distributed as possible.

A Congregational Manifesto

RECENT utterances by certain prominent Congregational ministers in Great Britain have elicited an avowal of orthodoxy from other leaders of that church. This is interesting, because Congregationalists, both there and on this side the Atlantic, have studiously refrained from formulating a creed. It has been the boast of the denomination that its ministers and churches have been left entirely free, within the limits of the Holy Scriptures. The result has been that the highest Calvinism may be preached from one Congregational pulpit, while extreme Arminianism is proclaimed from another. No Congregational minister can be tried for heresy on the ground that his teaching is not in accord with the standards of the church. Only if his doctrines are contrary to Scripture can he be deemed a heretic. It has, however, been considered necessary at various times for some ministers to make "a confession of faith." They have desired to make it clear that they do not hold doctrines which are held by certain other ministers of their own church. They have no desire to quit the church, and they have not the power to expel those with whom they differ; but they want it known that the doctrines they abhor are not the doctrines of the whole denomination. Such a time has now come and a confession of faith signed by the principals of Congregational colleges—who are necessarily expert theologians—and by all the ex-chairmen of the Congregational Union now living except two, has been issued. The confession consists of the following seven statements:

1. We believe in the personality of God the Father, transcendent as Maker and Ruler of all things, and yet, through his eternal Spirit, immanent in the world, and particularly in man and his history.
2. We believe that sin, so far from being necessary to man's development, is, as a distrust of God, and disobedience to him, a perversion of the moral and religious nature, which, apart from redemption, would involve man in ruin.
3. We believe that Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son of God, came into the world to reveal the holy love and grace of God, and to redeem men by the sacrifice of himself once for all upon the Cross for the sin of the world, so conveying to the individual believer the divine pardon.
4. We believe that this pardon is appropriated by faith in Jesus Christ, and that by this faith the Holy Spirit, producing union with the living Lord, regenerates human nature to eternal life.
5. We believe that the regenerate are the true Church, to which, among other sacred obligations, is committed the task of transforming the world, morally and socially, into the Kingdom of God.
6. We believe that the Bible is God's Book, because it enshrines the divine revelation culminating in the historic coming of Christ, his life, death, and resurrection, and the Gospel therein contained.
7. We believe that all truth is to be received as from God, and that the apparent conflict between science and religion not only can be adjusted, but is at the present time approaching a reconciliation.

This confession could become a creed only by its adoption by the separate churches. Not even the Congregational Union, which is a fellowship of the churches, could impose it on the entire denomination; but the eminence of the individual signers compels the respect of the whole church. Its brevity and the vagueness of some of the articles indicate that it was designed to cover minor differences of opinion among them, but whatever differences there are, it is clear they are all united against the movement now known as the New Theology. The fact that Dr. R. J. Campbell, the originator and advocate of this theology, is a Congregational minister, is the reason for the issue of this confession at the present time. It will be a satisfaction to orthodox believers to see that the doctrines of that new movement are repudiated by the leaders of this historic denomination.

Gifts to Evangelists

IN this age of large financial reward, it surprises nobody to learn that scientists, professors, and occasionally preachers also, share in the golden harvest. Recent announcement of the large gifts paid to certain evangelists seems, however, to have stirred up some lively criticism. One Brooklyn reader of this journal writes us directing attention to the fact that one evangelist has bought a fine mansion, while another has received a gift of $12,000 from the people of a Western town, where he conducted a successful five weeks' revival. The correspondent makes the blunt assertion that these people are "out after the money." A Washington reader writes us that this "thank-offering of $12,000, over $2,000 per week and over $100,000 per year, leads me to wonder whether that is what evangelists are in the business for."

There are two sides to this matter, both of which should receive consideration. In the first place, laying all prejudice aside, let us ask whether the evangelist does his spiritual work conscientiously and well. If he does and if, at its close, the people, in a spirit of generous recognition, choose to make a thank-offering of unusual proportions, that is clearly their affair and not the evangelist's. On the other hand, it is not to be denied that any evangelist, under such circumstances, does much harm to the cause of evangelism by accepting phenomenally large gifts for his own personal use. While it is a Scriptural maxim that "the laborer is worthy of his hire," the Gospel laborer would do wisely to avoid even the suggestion of mercenary motives and thus prevent any reflection being cast upon the spiritual work in which he is engaged. Above all other considerations we should set the integrity of the work itself. It should stand absolutely above reproach. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has always held that the worker in the Lord's vineyard, to be successful, must be uninfluenced by motives of personal gain. The passion for souls is incompatible with the passion for gold.

To those who have been quick to criticize the cases of the evangelists in question, we would say: Do not judge hastily and without a full knowledge of all the facts. It may be, and very likely is the case, that if all were explained, censure might turn to approval.

What Shall We Do With the Tramp?

WHAT should be done with the five hundred thousand tramps who are scattered throughout the length and breadth of this country, is a problem that might well puzzle statesmen as well as students of sociology. Can the tramp be eliminated? If so, by what process?

In the multitude of counselors there is wisdom, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, having confidence in the intelligence, humanity and justice of its readers, lays this problem squarely before them for their special consideration. We should be glad to have them send us their views on the best method of dealing with the tramp, not with a view to his suppression by force, nor to treat him as a criminal; but looking to his reformation and social and industrial rehabilitation, if these be possible.

One of our readers in Miami, Fla., writes, declaring that "the tramps, who are a nuisance and injury, should be drafted into the army, relieving all honorable young men and giving them a chance to become prosperous heads of families." We are not quite so clear that this is anywhere near the solution of the tramp problem. Rounding up the tramps and using them as food for powder might do very well in a European despotism; but we would fain indulge the hope that a better fate might be in store for them here. Poverty is not a crime, and involuntary idleness means poverty. Besides, may not the tramp be worth saving after all?

How then shall the tramp be eliminated? Shall it be by colonies, and if so, by what sort of colonies? Shall it be by extensive government works in different parts of the country, as suggested by another reader in Ronceverte, West Virginia? The season is near at hand when the tramp will distribute himself far and wide throughout the land. No one knows better than the farmers and those who live in rural districts how difficult it is to deal with this practical problem, which annually recurs in acute form. Making laws for the suppression of trampism; driving them from one county or township to another; imprisoning them as vagrants, and then supporting them at public expense—none of these meet the real question: What shall we do with the tramp? Send us your views, briefly stated, for publication, and address all such communications: Tramp Problem, care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

A Friend in Need

LOVERS of peace and progress in Cuba feel more and more thankful for what American influence is being exerted in Cuba by our government and by American business firms. They feel that the more they copy American ways, both in their commercial methods and in their government, the more secure life and property will become in the island republic.

Recently, our War Department proposed to withdraw the greater part of our troops on duty there, as our own military departments are suffering from lack of trained men for the spring and summer maneuvers. Protests at once poured in from all sides. It was urged that, while the real police work was done by the local rurales, the Americans constituted a great moral force that, by its very presence alone, prevented disorder. The officers and men have shown great tact in their intercourse with the Cubans, and prejudice against them has been rapidly dying out. It is now called the Army of Pacification, a title of which it may well be proud. Foreign nations have also objected to their leaving for a while, as they feel Cuba is still in a crucial political state.

Governor Wood, it will be remembered, cleared up the fever-infested cities of which he had charge, and now Havana, at the request of Governor Magoon, has appropriated $10,000,000 for a sewer system. When the Americans finally withdraw, the island will be in a much better state in every way than when they were forced to come in to save the islanders from themselves. Jokingly, the papers have referred to America as Cuba's elder brother, and this country has no need to be ashamed of the title; at least, the United States has always been its unselfish friend in need.

Turkey Yields to Italy

THAT was an amusing illustration of Turkish policy which was given by the recent Italian menace. The Sultan, as usual, resisted and delayed, and made various excuses, but when confronted by the decisive action of Italy, he promptly yielded. The demand of Italy shows that he can appreciate the principle our Lord commended.

Or what king, as he goeth to encounter another king in war, will not sit down first and take counsel whether he is able with ten thousand to meet him that cometh against him with twenty thousand? Or else, while the other is yet a great way off, he sendeth an ambassador, and asketh conditions of peace. (Luke 14: 31, 32 R.V.)

A Portrait on a Church Wall

A communication from the vicar of a country church appears in the columns of an English newspaper. He says that his congregation assembled for worship on a recent Sunday morning were surprised to see a shadowy looking figure facing them on the north wall, where no such object had been known to exist before. It would appear that the picture had been covered by a thin layer of plaster, and that the damp had caused it to show through its covering. The face of the figure is in profile, with a beard and curly hair. The head dress was apparently a crown. The left hand grasped a long wand surmounted with a fleur-de-lys. The clothing is a long robe of ermine, over which was a cloak open in front. The wall is of the fifteenth century, and the figure is believed to represent a king or noble of that period. An attempt to remove the plaster was so injurious to the painting that experts have been called in, as it is evidently a work of great value. How it came to be concealed under the plaster is a mystery and it is a still greater mystery that it should have remained hidden so many centuries. This concealment has been a loss to art, but unhappily an infinitely deeper loss has come to the congregations of some churches through the concealment of Christ under the forms and ceremonies and false doctrines emanating from the pulpit.

In vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men. (Matt. 15: 9.)

Saved by a Baby

A German family has been saved from deportation by its youngest member. The father, an ironworker, came to this country with his wife and child in the fall of 1906. He got work at Pittsburg and did well for a time. Seven months ago another baby was born and she cost her father and mother all the money they had saved. Then hard times came, men were laid off at the iron mills and the father lost his job.

her an American citizen. The pastor laid the case before the Washington authorities and they have now admitted that as the child cannot be sent back, it will be better for her parents to stay and take care of her. They are thankful that their child has the citizenship that enables them to stay. It is not so that parents acquire a place in Christ's kingdom, but it often happens that a child's citizenship leads its parents to seek the citizenship for themselves.

A little child shall lead them. (Isa. 11: 6.)

Unsalable Boot-heels

A manufacturer of boot-heels in New England sent a representative to Ireland expecting to effect extensive sales. To his astonishment, none were sold. An inquiry was made and it was learned that the objection to them consisted in the fact that the rubber was corrugated in the form of a cross. The manager of the firm said the people of Ireland hold a belief as to the sanctity of the cross so strongly that the thought of treading it in the dust under one's heel is to be regarded with nothing but horror. "In these circumstances," he said, "we have had to withdraw all stock bearing the objectionable cruciform design and substitute heels which are not calculated to offend religious susceptibilities. It was only recently that we discovered the cause of the widespread refusal to buy heels of our usual design." It may be hoped that the people so careful about keeping the symbol from desecration are still more careful lest they dishonor him by whom the cross was sanctified.

Of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy who hath trodden under foot the Son of God? (Heb. 10: 29.)

Japanese Insult Our Consul

An unpleasant incident in the far East is reported by the New York Herald. It states that Mr. W. D. Straight, our consul-general at Mukden, was recently aroused from sleep by a struggle between his watchman and a Japanese letter-carrier, who insisted on entering the consulate in spite of warning. Mr. Straight separated the combatants and retired to rest again. In a short time the letter-carrier returned with four Japanese heelers and attacked the watchman, who fled. The intruders then entered Mr. Straight's bedroom and maltreated him. He summoned his servants, who called in the Chinese police, and having had to complain of similar insults from the Japanese officers who have been placed in charge in Manchuria. The Tokio government will doubtless repudiate their officer's arrogant conduct. They know, as he may not, that the person of a foreign representative is sacred and an insult to him is an insult to the government that sent him. There are some

was for the right to establish post offices in Smyrna, Salonica, Jerusalem and Constantinople. Other European Powers have long had post offices in those towns, and Italy considered that as her treaty with Turkey contained the most favored nation clause, she had the same right. But these post offices have become a sore point with the Turkish Government, which holds that they are a reflection on her honor and capacity. They imply that Turkish officials are not to be trusted to handle the foreign mail bags, which indeed is the fact. The Sultan therefore would be glad to withdraw the privilege from the Powers already using it rather than extend it. He notified the Italian Government that the proposal was offensive to him, and he should resist it, and, in fact, posted Turkish soldiers in front of the building the Italians intended to use, to prevent their opening the offices. The Italian Government protested, but could get no satisfaction. In addition, there were other grievances of long standing. Turks who had sold land in Tripoli to Italians had been punished by the Sultan, who did not dare to punish the Italian buyers, but had thus made his own subjects afraid to sell more to Italians. He had also by vexatious regulations interfered with the entrance of Italian shipping to Tripoli, and an Italian priest had been murdered in Turkey without redress. It appeared on all these grounds that the Sultan regarded Italy as a weak power, and as his army is vastly superior to that of Italy, he believed himself safe in defying her. The Italian Government decided that it was time to teach the Sultan a lesson. A fleet of thirty-four vessels, including twelve first-class battle ships, assembled at Gaeta to carry an ultimatum to Turkey, with an intimation that further measures would be taken if the answer was not satisfactory. The Sultan waited until part of the squadron had sailed, and then yielded completely on all subjects in dispute, as he has done on various occasions in disputes with other governments, and when the final pressure was resolutely brought to bear. The Italian Government then recalled its fleet, and the incident was closed. Though the Sultan has probably never read the New Testament, his course in this matter

For their Redeemer is mighty; he shall plead their cause with thee. (Prov. 23: 11.)

An Invisible Light

A new microscope has been installed in the laboratory of Dr. William W. Gray, the Surgeon-General, in the War Department at Washington, D. C., which it is hoped will lead to the discovery of the parasitical origin of such maladies as scarlet and yellow fever, smallpox, etc. Dr. Gray is now beginning his experiments with the new instrument. He says that certain parasites cannot be detected by the highest-power microscopes employing the white light. The new microscope has therefore been invented to use the ultra-violet rays, the existence of which has long been known, but which are still a mystery. A reporter who witnessed one of the experiments was taken into a dark room, in which there was a powerful battery. From between two points of metal, the one cadmium and the other magnesium, a brilliant blue flame was produced, which, shining through a prism, presented the usual seven colors, beginning with red and ending with violet. Beyond the violet band of the spectrum was a murky gleam which Dr. Gray caught on a chemically prepared screen, and which, though invisible to the naked eye, when thrown on the reflector of the microscope changed its capacity immensely. With its aid every known bacillus can be detected, and it is believed that some now unknown will be discovered and identified. The marvel is that without the aid of the microscope and the peculiar electric mechanism, the ultra-violet rays cannot be used or even perceived, though they must have always existed. It is significant that they should have been discovered just at the time when science is realizing the importance of the study of the mischievous germs which they reveal. Who can tell what undiscovered powers there may be in nature by which moral evil may be exposed?

All things that are reprove are made manifest by the light; for whatsoever doth make manifest is light. (Eph. 5: 13.)

The Turkish Port of Smyrna

Not being able to find work in Pittsburg, he moved his family to New York, but he was unsuccessful in his search for employment. He went to the German consul for help and that official sent him to a charity society. Then the immigration bureau heard of the case and decided to send him back to Germany, as he had not been in the United States two years. He was very much cast down and his wife and children wept together in the Ellis Island refuge. There a German pastor saw them and found a way out of the difficulty. The youngest child, whose arrival had been the beginning of their troubles, could not be legally deported, as her birth here made the Japanese were made prisoners. They were taken to the Japanese consulate, where Mr. Straight made a formal complaint against them. To his astonishment they were not reprimanded, nor was any apology offered to him, but he was curtly informed that an inquiry would be made. Later, he was notified that the Japanese account differed from his, and he was invited to put his story in writing. Mr. Straight declined to place his word on an equal footing with that of Japanese coolies and warned the Japanese consul that he would have to report the insult to his government. The representatives of other nations are intently watching the result,

The Bowery Mission Free Labor Bureau

Over 700 Situations Found for Unemployed Men During the Past Winter

THE winter just passed has been a most active one with the Bowery Mission Free Labor Bureau.

Mr. John C. Earl, Financial Secretary, who is in charge of the bureau (which was established several years ago by Dr. Louis Klopsch, editor of this journal and President of the Mission), reports that positions were secured for 760 men, 235 of whom were sent to different parts of the country, principally in the rural districts, during the months of February, March and April. The methods adopted by the bureau are these: Notices are printed in newspapers throughout the country, stating that the bureau has on hand, at all times, several hundreds of capable unemployed workmen belonging to the various trades, and representing almost every branch of mechanical industry, skilled and unskilled. Employers in need of help are invited to communicate with the bureau. Such letters are forwarded to Mr. Earl, and a blank form of application is returned, which the employer fills up, stating the class of help he wishes to employ and the wages he agrees to pay. He is also asked to forward the cost of transportation, the bureau agreeing to supply the worker without any registration fee. On receiving the application properly filled up, with the money for transportation, a man is assigned to the employer and sent on without delay, his fare being prepaid. The employer is requested to notify the bureau of the arrival of the worker, and also to communicate further, stating whether the man is giving satisfaction. Secretary Earl's records show that, without a single exception, the employers are greatly pleased with the general arrangement, and that the men have buckled down to work in an earnest and hearty manner, with satisfaction to the patrons. Letters from the employers express appreciation of the prompt and businesslike methods of the Free Labor Bureau. In many instances, they write that more men of the same stamp can be employed in their neighborhood.

One letter from a New Jersey employer states that the man he engaged from the Free Labor Bureau (a painter), having finished his first job, has taken on two more contracts at $3.50 a day, and has good prospects of permanent work in that neighborhood. Another in the same State writes: "I like your man very much so far. You will receive word from others wanting help in this section." An employer in Poolville, N. Y., writes: "I am well pleased with the transaction on your part and with the labor rendered by the man." A Pennsylvania employer writes: "The man gives satisfaction thus far and we think we can work together to our mutual benefit." An employer in West Virginia writes: "Send me another set of blank applications for a neighbor who may give you an order." And so on, through hundreds of letters of the same character.

These 720 men who were thus fortunate in getting positions through the Free Labor Bureau belonged to the great army of the unemployed, which numbered nearly one-half million in New York this winter. Many, if not all, of these 720 have been represented at some with a breakfast at five A.M. on turning out to look for work.

That the men who are sent out by the Bowery Mission Free Labor Bureau are earnest, sober and reliable and really eager for work and desirous to keep it when secured, is shown by the letters received from them to the Mission. Every day brings a few of these missives from the men, telling the managers of the Free Labor Bureau how they are getting along in their new positions. The letters show that the spiritual influence of the meetings at the Mission has not been lost upon the men. One of the men writes from a neighboring State

"Last Sunday evening I gave a personal testimony at the Christian Endeavor meeting at the church here. I told them how a man can be saved by kind words and the teachings of the Lord Jesus. I showed these Endeavorers what a work the Bowery Mission is doing in bringing salvation to the drunkards and the outcasts, and in helping the unemployed. When I got through, they flocked around me in cordial greeting and said it was one of the best personal testimonies they had ever heard. It pays to serve Jesus."

Sociologists and others, who are personally interested in metropolitan philanthropies, have lately devoted considerable attention to the study of the Bowery Mission Free Labor Bureau, and have been surprised at the simplicity of its methods and the magnitude of its work. While attempts have been made in other quarters to aid the unemployed, they have met with comparatively small success, whereas the Free Labor Bureau, with the simplest of systems and absolutely without cost to the beneficiaries, has rendered substantial aid to hundreds of deserving men and won the approval of employers in all directions. As a medium of communication between the two classes, it has surpassed the expectations of its conductors, and it gives promise of still greater development. The tabulated statement on this page—which shows only a few days' results—is printed in order that our readers may form an idea of the wide range taken by the work of the Bureau.

The Free Labor Bureau will continue its work, and any one desiring information concerning the terms of employment and the class of workers available may apply to the Financial Secretary, Mr. John C. Earl, 92 Bible House, New York.

UP IN THE HIMALAYA MOUNTAINS

MISSIONARY WILLIAM GREET, who is stationed at the Tehri Border Village Mission, at Landour, in the Himalayas, has a strange Gospel field. Tehri is a native-ruled State, with 5,000 square miles of mountains, on whose steep and rugged sides are over 2,000 villages—still unevangelized! From Landour some 150 of these villages can be reached by the missionaries. Mr. Greet writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: "We are very grateful for the sum sent by your readers to help our work. We rather wonder that we are remembered, not having traveled away from our field to make it known; but it is a comfort to us when God gives us sufficient to go right on without leaving for great times and distances. We are sending a copy of our last six months' work in this hill world and among its people. We rejoice to see a big work wherever the Lord makes it possible in any of his many ways. May he still more fully bless THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its associated causes.

"In visiting the mountain forests where the native men make their charcoal for supplying Landour, and when holding a service, one has to climb to a position and sit with one's listeners above and below, almost vertically. For sleeping room at night one's choice often lies between a ledge of two feet wide over a bank or precipice, and a wider place where one can squeeze in between men who have not washed themselves for months."

"One of the best opportunities throughout this last year for spreading the message was afforded us by the visit to Landour of the wedding party of the rajah's daughter. Thousands of villagers were requisitioned for labor and supplies from different parts of the State, and many of them were from the northern valley where I had just been touring. On my return from that valley I came over the range with a number of the men who were bringing ghee, goats, butter, etc., for the rajah's following. We held meetings at halting-places while they rested. During the days that they were detained in Landour, we had meetings with them inside and outside the place allotted for their night shelter, and from among the many for whom there was no place except the open air on the roadside, we invited into our two small tents as many as could crowd into them out of the cold. This seems to have made a great impression on them, and we overheard them saying, 'Well, well, what other sahibs would call village people to occupy their tents?' Some of them took away tracts and Gospels to very distant parts where no preacher has gone, or is apparently likely to go, as yet."

Mrs. Greet writes: "As the women never leave the villages, or on such rare occasions that one may say never, my only chance in getting into touch with them is by going out. And it is a great refreshment to be able sometimes to take a share in my husband's work. There is the difficulty of the peculiar dialect, as the women do not speak and understand Hindi as the men do, but some one must go to them, and sometimes one in a group can understand Hindi. We have with us the Gospel of Matthew in the Tehri dialect—the only thing written or printed in this language—for indeed it is more a language than a dialect. Some brightly-colored Bible pictures interest them and help to make it easier to get at their understanding.

We are living at an elevation of nearly 7,000 feet, surrounded by snow in the winter, but in the valleys that lie between the ranges, reaching away to the 'eternal snows,' there is none. In our field there are no roads into the populated valleys, but only worn foot-tracks over all sorts of ground and no dak bungalows; beasts of burden are out of the question; men must carry all our baggage."

Questions and Answers

I. H. S. Union, Ind. What is the origin of "Every tub must stand on its own bottom"? The quotation is from Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, Part I. We regret that we cannot answer your other question.

V. E. T., Philadelphia, Pa. Were you correct in saying that Gen. 1: 27 and 2: 7 were the first intimations of man's immortality? The same words are used in describing the creation of the lower animals.

We did not intend to imply that the words proved man's immortality, but that they were the first intimation of it. We do not expect to find doctrines proved by the record in Genesis, but there is there, in the expression of man being in the image of God, and in the breath of life being breathed by God into his nostrils, an intimation of so decided a difference between that and the creation of the lower animals as to suggest the idea of a difference in that life. This implied a capacity to which Christ gave a full meaning (see John 1:12).

D. G., Hackensack, N. J. Is there a University of Arizona?

Yes; established in 1891. It is at Tucson, and in 1905 had 28 instructors and 200 students. It is supported by funds donated by the United States Government and Arizona.

J. C. P., Winkler, Tex. Is God's glory a material substance? It seems to be so represented in describing the appearance on Mount Sinai. (Ex. 24:16, 17.)

There are several such expressions in the Old Testament. His presence appears to have been manifested by light of inconceivable brightness, which indicated not so much his substance or form, as a sign of his majesty. We are told that "he dwelleth in light." He appeared to Moses in a glowing bush that gave light, but was not consumed, and when Moses went up to the mount he does not appear to have seen any shape save in the account in Ex. 33: 23, which was evidently exceptional. The fact of Moses' face shining seems to indicate that he was in the presence of a brilliant light, which prevented his seeing any actual substance.

J. McK., Des Moines, Ia. What is the name of Belgium's national song?

"La Brabanconne, composed in 1830. The words were composed by Jenvai, a Frenchman, and the music by Francois van Campenhout.

Old Subscriber, Toronto, Canada. From what did Ash Wednesday derive its name?

It was the custom in the Middle Ages for the priest and congregation to sprinkle themselves with ashes on the first day of Lent. It received the sanction of the Church in 1191, but some theological writers trace the custom back six centuries before that date.

L. L. DeB., Hutchinson, Kan., writes:

In the MAIL-BAG I find a question from L. W. D., Hammondsport, N. Y., asking why, if the government can prevent the adulteration of foods, it does not prevent the adulteration of liquors. The government prevents the adulteration of both foods and liquors where they are made. Foods are sold to the consumer in the original package and are untouched by the retailer, and hence are unadulterated. Liquors are sold to the consumer by the glass or in refilled bottles, and can be and are adulterated by the retailers.

J. W., Menomonee, Wis. 1. Are the Jews of the present day descendants of Judah exclusively, or are any of them descendants of other tribes? 2. What became of the ten tribes carried captive to Assyria? 3. What was the cause of the Jewish dislike of the Samaritans?

1. It is probable that some few descendants of the ten tribes joined themselves to the Jews in Babylon, or before the exile, and were received and became part of the nation from whom the modern Jews are descended. 2. There is no positive information. As they had abandoned their faith in God, under their corrupt kings, there was nothing to hold them together but the tie of race. They were consequently liable to be absorbed by the populations among whom they dwelt. Some students think that the Anglo-Saxons are descended from them, and they certainly have the energy and enterprise characteristic of the sons of Abraham. 3. If you refer to II. Kings 17: 23-26, you will see that the Samaritans were of alien races planted in the Israelitish cities and therefore naturally odious to the Jews.

H. S., Reading, Pa. Did Benjamin Franklin have a daughter?

Yes; she was named Sarah, and was born in Philadelphia in 1744. She died in 1808. In 1767 she married Richard Bach, who later became United States Postmaster-General. During the Revolution she at-therefore cannot identify any modern disease with it. Medical men who have had the care of demented people say that their cunning and malignity and delight in mischief are in some cases extraordinary. This suggests a resemblance, but not absolute identification.

Reader, New Orleans, La. Where is Mount Ampersand?

It is a mountain in the Adirondacks, Franklin County, N. Y., a short distance from Mount Seward and Lower Saranac Lake. It is 3,432 feet in height.

New Brunswick Reader. In what county of Maine does the Aroostook River rise and what is its length in miles?

It rises in Piscataquis County and is 140 miles long.

R. T., Dover Plains, N. Y. What is meant by "applying an anti-fouling composition" to the sides of sea-going vessels?

It is a coating applied to the hulls of ships below the water-line to prevent the adherence of barnacles, seaweed, etc.

A Remarkable Ferry-Boat, Propelled by the Passengers

ONE of the very latest novelties in aquatics is a catamaran or "twin" ferry-boat. It is operated by six or eight passengers, and is set in motion by means of the levers shown in the photograph. Although the photographer has seen fit to fill the boat with ladies, in order, probably, to make his picture more attractive, it need hardly be explained that the craft is not necessarily a ladies' boat, nor yet a pleasure boat. It is, however, a serviceable-looking affair, with simple mechanism operating two paddles underneath. It is said to be the safest of all ferry-boats, and is capable of being made practically unsinkable.

Do devils obtain possession of men now as they did in Christ's time?

1. Christ seems to have used the title to indicate his representative character as the second Adam, the representative of the whole human race, who by his work would restore it to the privileges it had lost. There were few surnames in that day. Men were identified by their parentage, as James the son of Zebedee. But Jesus did not call himself Jesus, son of Joseph, but the Son of Man, as if to identify himself with the race. 2. No; it is well that he told us that the life had been so full and to assure us that enough had been told to answer the purpose stated (John 20: 31). 3. E. S., Jamestown, Pa. In what year did the revolution occur in Ireland, which is mentioned in the song "Boys of Water"?

It was the Revolution of 1688, when William III. came to the throne of England and James II. was driven out. James gathered his forces in Ireland and William came over to meet them. The latter was victorious in the Battle of the Boyne, fought July 1, 1690.

A. D. L., Yantic, Conn. Why have you so little to say in the way of warning about the New Theology which Dr. Pentecost, Rev. Smith Baker and other ministers so severely condemn?

We doubt whether severe condemnation, or even logical argument is the wisest course to take in dealing with such teaching as the New Theology. The ministers you mention have a perfect right to their own methods, but for ourselves we prefer to adopt the course prescribed by Gamaliel (Acts 5: 38, 39): "Let these men alone; for if this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to naught; but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it." The New Theology is a rebound from some real evils existing in the Church and may result in curing them, but no Christian nor any sincere seeker will accept it as a substitute for the Gospel. It does not supply the remedy for sin and the hope of eternal life that the old Gospel supplies. It is with that as with the wine Christ spoke of (Luke 5: 39): "No man having drunk old wine straightway desireth new; for he saith, 'The old is better.'"

PHILADELPHIA'S REVIVAL HARVEST

TOWARD the close of the Philadelphia revival campaign, led by Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman and Charles M. Alexander, the city was stirred as rarely before in its history. For five and a half weeks the campaign went forward, with meetings nightly in twenty-one districts, attended by an average of 25,000 to 40,000 people. In addition, all sorts of special meetings were held, including noon-day meetings for business men at the Garrick Theatre, saloon meetings, railway meetings, meetings in jails and prisons, and open-air meetings. A total of nearly seventy-five evangelists, Gospel singers and other helpers assisted in the great movement. It is estimated that between 10,000 and 15,000 publicly confessed Christ or were reclaimed from lives of worldliness.

Mr. Alexander's revival hymns have captivated the city. They are being sung, hummed and whistled in homes and factories and on the streets. One of his new hymns, entitled "He Will Hold Me Fast," has proved an especial favorite with men. One night a man working in Philadelphia was attending the service at Bethany Church, and was converted through this hymn. That young man stated it was the thought of Christ holding him fast that made him become a Christian. It was learned afterward that the young man's brother was recently converted through Dr. Charles W. Gordon (Ralph Connor), and is now a member of the latter's church in Winnipeg, Canada. Another popular hymn of the Mission has been "Memories of Mother." One evening, a visitor from New York told Mr. Alexander that during the singing of it in the metropolis recently, sixty-five men accepted Christ as their Saviour.

A few days ago, a leading bank in the city of Philadelphia received $250 through the mail. A year ago there had been a shortage of that amount in their accounts. The sender had been convicted as a result of the revival movement. One of the largest firms in the city received a letter from a young man who had formerly been in their employ. He confessed that he had taken a small part of a machine while working for them and enclosed $1.50 in payment. He was convicted of sin at a noon-day meeting, and made a public confession at a church meeting at night.

Another striking characteristic of the movement was the conviction of sin. Men and women everywhere seemed deeply concerned about their soul's salvation.

Jim Berwick, the railroad evangelist who conducted successful meetings in railway shops around Philadelphia, encountered a remarkable case of conviction one day. He said: "I left the Garrick Theatre on Monday noon immediately after the noon meeting conducted by Dr. Ostrom, intending to take lunch in a restaurant near by. I had never eaten in this section of the city before. I saw a number of attractive restaurants, but for some unexplainable reason I passed them by until at length I found myself on Tenth Street. I entered a restaurant and found a table where, as soon as I sat down, a stranger said to me: 'And here you then walked up the street with him feeding him the Word as we went along."

Rev. H. D. Sheldon, one of the evangelists, gave the following example of how midnight prayer won the victory. He said: "At the close of a men's meeting in the Lutheran Church at Glenside, Philadelphia, one of the ministers said to me, 'There is a business man here to-day who is deeply moved, yet he does not believe in the Divinity of Jesus Christ. Will you pray for him?' Ten days after the meeting had closed, this pastor called on his friend and gave him literature to read, relative to the Divinity of Christ, and asked him to read certain passages of Scripture, which he promised to do. That night the minister could not sleep. At 11 P.M. he went into his study to pray. So great was his burden that after praying until 11:30 P.M. he was led to call his friend up on the telephone. He at once responded and said that he was in the midst of all the matter given him. Then he called up a good woman on the 'phone, and she got her husband and other Christians to join him in prayer. Through the night they went on praying, while the unsaved friend went on reading and studying. At last the minister came to James 1:6, 7, 'But let him ask in faith, nothing wavering; for he that wavereth is like a wave of the sea, driven with the wind and tossed. For let not that man think he shall receive anything of the Lord.' Then he trusted and believed that he had the victory. At two o'clock in the morning he called up his friend again and asked how the struggle was going. He replied, 'It is settled, and now I want you to pray with me for my boy.'"

The only peace you will ever find is in him. Will you take him?' He burst into tears in spite of the throngs about us, and, reaching out his hand across the table, said: 'I'll do it; and I want you to pray for my wife and boy.' I

New York's Campaign Opened

A GREAT audience gathered in the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, recently, to inaugurate the fourth season of open-air evangelistic work in that city. On the stage was a volunteer chorus of eight hundred from the city choirs, who assisted Singing Evangelist Charles M. Alexander in the service of song that preceded. Rev. A. B. Schauffer presided. One hundred and forty clergymen took part in the meeting. The Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman made the principal address.

It was stated that $40,000 was needed to carry out the work planned in the tents and open air this summer. A call was made for pledges, and cards were passed through the audience and considerable sums were promised.

THE COMPASS ON LIFE'S VOYAGE*

By JOHN C. HAVEMEYER

I WAS impressed very much several months ago by the suggestions regarding human life which came to me in connection with the steamers sailing from New York. I saw an item in a newspaper that great crowds of people were returning to their native land, and that in some cases they were so anxious to go that they slept on the wharves or docks of New York, to be ready for the next steamer. The inquiry came to my mind, why is it that these people desire to take a particular steamer, and in many cases not so large and comfortable as others? The evident answer was that the value of the steamer to them depended upon its destination, and that every steamer which sails has a particular place or port to which it carries passengers and cargo. How natural it was to recall that I and every human being must have a destination, whether we are conscious of it or not, and that upon it will depend our welfare and success in life. A man without a purpose is indeed to be pitied, and his life will be a failure.

The next thought was that the owners of every vessel realized that to reach the distant port, a chart is necessary which would show the exact course to be followed. This fact again surely applies to human life. What man or woman can expect to fulfil duty and reach heaven without the divine chart which the Bible is?

A moment's reflection showed me that something more was needed, and I recalled that a compass is indispensable in order to make use of the chart, and so important is this considered in navigation that an officer is always on deck to see that the course of the ship closely follows it. So we all require the compass of the Holy Spirit to enable us to understand and to keep in the way that the Bible points out.

Then I recalled that there is always a rudder or helm which is used constantly to make the other outfit available. Among men this represents will or decision which controls one's life. Is any one of us sailing over the sea of life without the fixed purpose or determination to have our course daily directed heavenward?

But with all this a steamer would still be unable to move, and great boilers and furnaces are placed in the vessel in which huge fires are kept up, and these are connected with immense engines and propellers. This again suggests the force of ability to do things which belongs to life, and which God bestowed when he breathed into man's nostrils the breath of life and man became a living soul. There is an innate force in men which enables them to act, but it may be directed for good or evil. We may expend it in the service of God or Satan.

However, this does not complete the preparation of the steamer for the voyage. It must be ballasted so that it will be exactly level and the ballast prevented from shifting, which would affect the speed and safety of the ship. We, too, must be ballasted with principle or righteousness and be consistent in our lives and not subject to impulsive changes and thus prevent the even keel which is essential. To be steadfast and immovable is a Christian's glorious privilege.

Another matter considered by the owner of the vessel is that the cargo shall be adapted or suitable to the country to be visited. A wise owner would not, for instance, send a load of ice to Greenland or Norway, or fruit to Italy or Africa; neither would he take passengers who, for any reason, would be unacceptable or forbidden to land. Otherwise the vessel would not be welcome and the profit of the voyage would be affected. To my mind there is a most important lesson here for every one. Death of course will end the voyage of life. The question then will be whether our character or record, which represents the cargo, is such as to fit us for the atmosphere of heaven, where there is divine perfection and purity? Has there been a preparation of faith and prayer that will transform us to the likeness of God? Even if moral and not criminal according to the standard of the world, have we failed in the supreme love to God and the love for our neighbors, which is what Christ teaches to be obedience to God's commandments? If not, would we be satisfied and happy there, even if permitted to enter?

The Bible gives the wonderful assurances that the true Christian when he reaches heaven will be like God, for he shall see him as he is, and we will hear the glorious invitation, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." God "waits to be gracious," and Christ said, "Ye will not come to me that ye might have life." Does not this mean that God will be grieved and disappointed if we come short of his glory?

No steamer is fitted for a voyage which does not carry signal lights and rockets that in case of need will secure aid from passing vessels. We are all liable to be diverted from our course by contrary winds and unfavorable currents, especially where the sun and stars have been obscured and we are not sure of our location. Then it is our privilege and duty to put up a signal of distress or in other words go to our fellow Christians for help to learn more perfectly the will of God, and for needed light and strength to fulfil it.

I have thought to be very practical in this study, and we will be wise if each one inquires how far he has learned and regarded the lessons which even a speechless steamer may teach us. We can not deceive God. How foolish to deceive ourselves! Shall we not hereafter try to make the most of our life while learning all we can from God's works and ways in the visible creation around us, and carry away with us for thought and instruction the lessons that have been suggested?

No-License Sweeps Massachusetts

On April 6 many Massachusetts towns voted, and six changed from License to No-License, viz.: Agawam, Charlton, Shutesbury, Southbridge, Wales and West Springfield. Three hundred and three of the 321 towns show a net gain for no-license of 4,614 votes, with twenty-three towns changing from license to no-license, and thirteen towns changing from no-license to license. The license majority of 14,604 in Massachusetts before the city elections of December, 1906, is now changed into a no-license majority of 17,989, this being, except 1893, the greatest sweep no-license-ward that Massachusetts has ever known.

IN THE BUDDING SPRING TIME

The Country Parson

NOT a few of our great men have had their origin in the simple homes of country parsons, who have combined love for Christ and the Church with fine ideals and a noble usefulness. The old fling about the sons of ministers is seldom heard in these days, so many of them having forged to the front and taken high rank in the world's work. Not infrequently, the home of the minister, though simple and frugal, is the centre of culture for the community. The eager, ambitious boy who is reaching out to something better than the district school affords him, consults the minister, borrows books from his library, and finally goes out to a place in the city, or perhaps to college, fortified by the minister's counsel and friendship.

Staying for the week-end at a small village inn, far back among the hills, a New York merchant and his wife, who were taking a holiday trip in their motor-car, attended the parish church on Sunday morning. All told, there were forty people in the congregation. A young lady played the melodeon and led the singing; the minister, a man of middle age, preached a sermon that went straight to the hearts of the strangers.

There are thousands of able, earnest preachers in this land who are doing God's work with fine ability, comforting the bereaved, strengthening the weak, assisting the tempted, yet whose names will never be written on any roll of fame, and whose stipends are barely enough to enable them to live and bring up their families, who can never hope to make any provision for the future. Too brave to complain, these men accept poverty with heroic fortitude, and their sons and daughters grow strong and sturdy through many a struggle with adversity. Since for one youth who is injured by self-denial and hardship in school days there are ten who become irresponsible and degenerate through over-much luxury and the possession of too much money, the children of the manse are not to be pitied.

Occasionally one finds a country parsonage where, at the cost of much planning and thrift, new books are often afforded, but too frequently the minister finds himself stunted in the one direction which for him is almost a vital necessity. How shall he keep up with modern thought unless he can read at least some of the vital books that are issuing from the press? Yet there are two books that the country minister reads and studies to great advantage—one that unfailing mine of spirituality and intellectual culture, the Word of God, and the other the book of human nature.

"Where Is My Hat?"

One almost never hears a woman crying frantically that she has mislaid her hat. Hats and bonnets are so dear to the feminine heart that the natural and obvious thing appears to be to put them in a safe and proper place when they are not in use. A man, on the contrary, notwithstanding the fact that he is lost without a hat, and seldom wishes to take two steps away from his front door minus that top finish to his costume, is constantly throwing his hat down in a corner or leaving it in the veranda or the wood-shed or on his wife's dressing table or somewhere else that is the wrong place for a man's hat, and then, when anxious to go down street to the post office or the train, he ransacks the house to discover the missing article. Until it is found there is no rest beneath that roof for anybody. "Where is my hat?" demands the man. If his wife is in a teasing frame of mind, she may reply tranquilly, "I can tell you, my dear," only to add when further interrogated, "It is just wherever you left it." This is by no means a soothing reply to make to an irritated man.

The principal use of a hat, after it has fulfilled its duty of sheltering its wearer from wind and sun, is to be gracefully removed when man or boy meets a friend. The art of lifting the hat is one that should be acquired early in life, and little boys should be compelled to practise it when they meet their sisters and their mothers, their aunts and their cousins on the way home from school. Over the gulf of fifty years, a venerable friend has said that she remembers the extreme grace with which a certain young man used to lift his hat when he passed her on the road. "My dear," she said, "that man might have married any girl in our town. His manner was that of the courtier."

"And what became of him?" was the inquiry. A shadow passed over the old face. "He was killed at Gettysburg!"

A Housekeeper's Frank Expression

Here is a letter that it gives me genuine pleasure to insert. I presume the writer is more practical than I am myself, and I am nearly sure that she fairly represents the majority. This is the way she criticises my view as to washing on Monday:

"I read in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of March 18 your article in which you suggest that housekeepers put off

The Stealing On of Age

AMONG the letters that came to the editor of the Family Page one day lately was a communication from a woman of fifty-three who bemoaned herself because she was growing old, and who declared that the young people around her were not backward in letting her know that she had passed her meridian. Everything about youth and age is relative. There are women who never were young even in their twenties; there are women who will never grow old should they live to be ninety. To fifteen, thirty is venerable. To thirty, sixty-five may represent old age.

Granting that there is no decay of mind or body, it is hard to say when youth ends and age begins; but fifty-three should be to a woman her glorious Indian summer of life. She ought then to have passed quite beyond the reefs and shoals that make the current difficult at an earlier period, and she should have so much genial experience, so much breadth of sympathy, such mellow tolerance for those who differ with her, such gracious kindness and such queenly dignity that younger and older people should dearly love and gladly honor her. At fifty-three no woman can afford to be careless about her dress. She may be obliged to choose cheap material, but color and cut should be becoming. She ought not to wear frumpy hats, and she should be fastidious as to the finishings at her neck and wrists. Whether stout or thin, the season has arrived when she should take pains to adopt a style of dress suitable to her figure. More and more she should keep in touch with her world, reading the newspapers to know what is going on, and making the most of any talents or accomplishments that were hers in earlier life. The woman of fifty-three should be a leader in church work, and a good friend to all the neighborhood.

Carlyle said, "Time wears slippers of list, and his tread is noiseless." When a woman really grows old, if she is in fair health and strength, she proves the truth of this assertion. Age does not storm at her; it steals softly onward so imperceptibly that she is often the last one to notice what is going on. If she is foolish, she may behave as did Mrs. Skewton in Dombey and Son, may dress girlishly, resort to every artifice of false hair and cosmetics, and may rob age of its real beauty by her pitiful attempts to continue childish and young. In the battle with Time, sooner or later every one will be vanquished. It is wise to make Time a friend, to recognize his claims, and to meet him half way. To settle down too soon to arm-chair and foot-stool is as great a mistake as that of Mrs. Skewton. So far as one may, one should continue active, since early retirement may mean atrophy of one's powers.

In one of Augustus Hare's delightful biographical sketches he mentions a visit to a country house where a Mrs. Duncan Stewart was expected. This lady was past four-score. In a large house-party every one was eagerly anticipating her arrival, and when she came she received an enthusiastic welcome from her hosts and their guests. She came in to dinner dressed in black velvet and lace. She had a word, a jest, a smile for every one. To her life was as full of interest as it had been when she was young, and the interest she felt in others kept her young and charming to her latest day. Some one asked her if she found the cup still sweet. "Yes," she answered, "sweet to the bottom of the cup."

CELEBRATING MAY DAY

THE celebration of May Day goes farther back than history can follow on its trail. These little maids celebrate the advent of spring in almost the same fashion as their ancestors in other lands observed the festival centuries ago. The May-pole, the May-walk and the May-Queen are now familiar to American communities. Our photograph shows a group of school-girls led by the May Queen, who are about to take part in the festival in a public park.

their washing until Tuesday, and once before you inquired why housekeepers think they must wash Monday! As a practical housekeeper, and one not enslaved by system, I do not understand your point of view. What possible gain can there be in putting it off? A housekeeper who has used Sunday rightly is so rested on Monday that she feels like vigorous work. It is as much of a rest and change to go at the washing as it is to keep Sunday properly. Then the washing is done and out of the way, instead of having to be done when one is partly tired with the other work of the week. As for putting the clothes to soak Sunday night, no one who knows how to wash will do it. Clothes soaked over night are harder to wash than those not soaked at all. An hour's soaking in the morning is the right amount."

JOE AND THE BOSS

By CHARLES LEE SLEIGHT

JOE BIELBY clenched his gnarled fingers and glanced impatiently at the clock. Had it stopped? No; as he listened he could hear it ticking. He could also hear through the closed door beside him the subdued murmur of voices; and then—merciful heavens! was that a moan from the boy?

He sprang forward savagely and seized the door-knob, but his wife glided to him and drew him back, remonstrating: "Don't go in. Dr. Randall declared 't he wouldn't feel no pain."

"All right," he muttered; and shaking off her grasp, strode to the window and gazed out with unseeing eyes.

A year ago they had noticed that something was wrong with little Tom. At first—God forgive them!—they had scolded the boy for not walking straight, for being cross and cranky and lazy; and then, discovering that his ailment was physical, they had called in their physician, and after weary months of fruitless experimenting with various remedies, he had advised their sending for a specialist, if they could afford it.

"If we can afford it!" the father had repeated. "O' course we can. Ain't the boy all we've got in the world?"

The great city doctor was in the bedroom now examining the boy, and they were awaiting his verdict. Presently the door opened and he came out hurriedly, grabbed up his hat and gloves, and with a murmured "good morning," rushed off.

"He wants to catch the next train," explained Dr. Randall, their own physician, who had followed him into the sitting-room. "He wished me to tell you that the case is beyond his skill—Now, now, sit down, both of you, and hear me out! He recommends another eminent surgeon who has had wonderful success with similar cases."

"How much 'd that other one charge to come and cure Tom?" asked Joe.

"Why, bless you, man!" exclaimed Dr. Randall, "he wouldn't come for love or money. Patients must go to him; and as he has more than he can do, his charges are—well, rather steep. I wrote him recently about your boy, and received a reply this very morning. He practically guarantees a cure, but his fee will depend upon the length of treatment required. Judging from my description of the case, he thinks it would cost not less than one thousand dollars."

Joe gasped, and repeated blankly: "One—thousand—dollars!"

"Yes. Have you that much, or can you raise it?"

"Have I got it—one thousand? Why, after I've paid that New York doctor I won't have enough to pay one single dollar on your bill."

"Never mind me, Bielby; and that New York doctor said that, as he had done nothing, he would charge nothing. I have been thinking over this matter, and it occurred to me that your employer, Mr. Brock, might help you out. Perhaps you could get a loan from him, or possibly he might even give you what you need."

"What! the boss?" jeered the man. Then, springing up, he tramped heavily back and forth across the little room, vociferating: "Twenty long years have I worked for him, and he ain't never give me one cent! They claim he has two million dollars he ain't got no use for, and he's going to give it to hospitals, and orphan asylums, and such like. Where 'd he get all that money? Who helped him earn it? I did. These two hands helped. Look at 'em once, all crooked up, and calloused, and nails all black and broke! And what have I got to show for it? Just a bare living, that's what, and he's got two millions to give away. Is that right? Is that fair?"

The physician put up his eyeglasses and studied the grim, scowling face with as much interest as if it were a rare microbe.

"Do you think he ought to divide with you?" he inquired, curiously.

"Well, maybe not exactly divide," said

Joe, doubtfully; "but seems to me, as things are, either he's been getting too much, or we haven't been getting enough."

"Doesn't he pay good wages? and didn't he give you a ten per cent. advance last year?"

"Yes; but that was just to keep us from striking, and then he gets even by putting up the rent on us. But the point is just this, doctor, he's got more 'n he needs, and I ain't got enough. Now, he couldn't have earned no money without us men to work for him."

"Oh, yes, he could. He could easily get other men, you know. But you couldn't work without him to run the mill."

For an instant Joe was nonplussed. Then he retorted, triumphantly: "If he died to-morrow, another boss 'd take his place."

"Sit down," said the doctor, quietly, motioning to a chair, "and listen to me. What you want is to get this money. Very well. After your dinner go to Mr. Brock, tell him frankly about your boy, and ask him for a loan. You can repay it from your wages by instalments. It's a simple business proposition, and he can do no more than refuse. I also will see him this afternoon, and will add a word in your behalf."

Two hours later Joe entered the private office of Mr. Brock, and stepped forward to the desk where that gentleman was engaged in signing a batch of checks.

"Well, Bielby, what can I do for you?" asked his employer, pleasantly. He had a strong face, ordinarily prepossessing, all except the mouth, and that at present was relaxed in a smile of self-satisfied benevolence.

"I just want to see you a minute, sir," apologized Joe, rubbing his chin in embarrassment, and glancing down at a newly signed check lying before him. He started perceptibly as he read it: "Pay to the order of St. Christopher's Orphanage one hundred thousand dollars." It was true, then, the report that Mr. Brock intended to distribute among charities a part of his surplus wealth. The figures on several other checks stared up at him, one for $50,000, another for $75,000, and a third—he gasped when he caught sight of it—for $300,000.

"Well?" queried his employer, but not so pleasantly as before.

Haltingly Joe told his story, and ended with a request for a loan.

"Him!" ejaculated Mr. Brock, compressing his thin lips into a hard line. "You say it is a simple business proposition. What security have you to offer?"

"Why, sir, I thought—or, leastwise—Dr. Randall—he thought," stammered Joe, "that you might keep some out of my wages each payday."

"So it is Randall's scheme, hey? Very good of him, I'm sure." Mr. Brock placed the tips of his fingers together, as if about to engage in prayer, and went on blandly: "I am sorry for your trouble, my man, but it will be impossible to grant your request. It would be practically insuring your health and life for a term of years, and you can readily see that it would be neither fair nor just to grant you that privilege without granting it to all the rest of the hands, and that would tie up my capital and seriously cripple the work, to say nothing of the risk incurred. You understand, do you not?"

"Yes, sir," replied Joe, dully, hopelessly.

"Besides," continued Mr. Brock, indicating the checks lying upon the desk, "I am at present contemplating some—er—benefactions that will take about all the funds I can spare. I regret my inability to assist you, and trust you may secure elsewhere the sum you desire."

Taking this for a dismissal, Joe turned away without a word. In the doorway Mr. Brock's youngest son, Albert, met him, and with a cheerful, "Hello, Joe," bounded confidently into the room, calling, "Busy, father?"

JOE AND THE BOSS

"Never too busy to see you, my son," me the gentle reply.

Joe paused, and glanced back at the boy, so straight and sturdy in back and limb, and at the pile of checks, representing a thousand times the amount that he needed to make his own boy well and strong-limbed; and then, with a bitter growl, he banged the door shut, and strode away.

Outside Dr. Randall was awaiting him. "You didn't succeed," cried the physician, the moment he caught sight of Joe's face. "Never mind! I'll see him now, and perhaps I shall fare better."

But a half hour later he appeared before the open window where Joe was at work, and said: "He will do nothing for you, Bielby. Don't lose heart, however. I'll see some of my friends, and try to secure the sum we need."

But as he turned away, he muttered to himself: "I fear it will take too long. The boy ought to go at once."

That evening Mr. Brock was sitting in his study at home trying to read, but the voices of his two children, Albert and Gertrude, in an adjoining room kept distracting his attention. Finally, discovering that the door between the two rooms was ajar, he stepped forward to close it. When he reached it a sentence from Albert aroused his curiosity, and he stood there, listening.

"Play you're father, Gertie," said Albert, "and I'll be Dr. Randall, for I know just near 'xactly what the doctor said, 'cause I was there in the office and heard him. You sit down at your desk, and I'll come in."

He backed into a corner of the room, and presently stepped forward briskly, saying: "Good afternoon, Mr. Brock. Stand up, dummy, and shake hands, and say, 'Have a chair, doctor.'"

Gertrude mechanically obeyed, and the boy continued: "I came to see you about Joseph Bielby and his poor little sickly. Can't you lend him twelve or fifteen hundred dollars to get his boy cured? You got such a lot o' money, you'll never miss it."

"Now, Gertie, it's your turn. Just wave your hand over those pieces of paper—they're checks, you know—and say, 'I can't do it, doctor. These benefactions will take all I got to spare.'"

After a little prompting the girl stumbled through her part. Then the boy sprang to his feet, and fiercely shaking his finger at her, said sharply: "Have you a right to give away all that money? Didn't Joe Bielby and the other men work and help earn it? I ask you, sir, is it right to give away their money?"

Mr. Brock winced at these words, even as he had winced at the more polished phrases of Dr. Randall, for the one thing he prided himself upon was his firmness and justice. He knew he was not naturally generous, and never pretended to be, even to himself. His presents to charity were simply memorials to his beloved wife; they were done in her name, they were prompted by love for her, and not love of giving. But to be called unjust! He wondered if it were true. He also wondered, with a faint smile, if he had looked as startled and scared that afternoon as Gertrude looked now.

"Thay, Albert," faltered the little girl, "let's don't play offth any more. 'Tithn't try much fun."

"Hold on! Just let's play it a little bit more," coaxed her brother. "I've thought how we can end it perfectly elegant. You'll like this part of it all right, I know. It's real pertend; it didn't really happen, but I just simply made it up. I'll be father this time, and you be Mr. Thompson, the secretary."

"Ahem! good morning, Thompson—Don't sit down, silly! the secretary never sits, unless Mr. Brock tells him to!—er—I've changed my mind, Thompson. You can burn up all these checks and we'll make new ones, 'cause I'm going to give part of the money to the mill hands, 'cause they earned it, you know. Now, let's see, how shall I divide it?"

"Divide even," said practical Gertrude, repeating the maxim instilled into their minds since babyhood.

"No, Thompson, that wouldn't be fair, 'cause Joe Bielby has worked for me twenty years, and there's Jerry Durgan only came last May. N-o-w, let-me-see. I tell you what! We'll give every man a hundred dollars for each year he's been in the mill. And say, Thompson, make out a check for twenty hundred for Joe first of all, and give it to him to-day, so't he can get poor little Tom cured right away. Well, that's all, Thompson. You can go."

Mr. Brock softly closed the door, and stepping to his desk, seized the telephone receiver. "Hello, Central! give me two, eight, seven. . . . Hello! is that you, Thompson? . . . Yes; this is Mr. Brock. Have you sent the checks to those institutions? . . . Haven't, eh? Well, don't send them until you see me. I want to make out new ones. Understand? . . . Yes. That's it. And, by the way, how long has Bielby worked for us? . . . This is his twenty-first year, eh? Thank you. That's all. Good-by."

He hung up the receiver, took a check-book from a pigeon-hole, filled out a check to Joseph Bielby for twenty-one hundred dollars, and slipping it into an envelope, reached out his hand to press an electric button. But all at once he paused, and with a transfiguring smile on his lips, impulsively arose, and went out.

"Is he off at last?" asked Joe Bielby that same evening, as his wife came from little Tom's room and softly closed the door behind her.

"Yes," she sighed, wearily sinking into a chair; "but I thought he never would go to sleep. There's somebody at the street door. Hurry down, before they knock again."

Joe clumsily tiptoed to the hall and down the creaking stairs, but when he saw that his caller was Mr. Brock, he stood in silent amazement.

"May I come in?" inquired his employer.

"Why, sure!" returned Joe. But at the foot of the stairway he paused to whisper: "If you'll come quiet like, sir. It's one of the boy's bad nights, and we just got him to sleep."

"Then I'll not go up," said Mr. Brock.

After a moment's waiting, he laid his hand on Bielby's rough coat-sleeve, and asked impressively: "Joe, have I been unfair and unjust to my men?"

"You've always used me right, Mr. Brock."

"But you think that I should divide all my profits equally among my employees."

"Oh, no, sir! That wouldn't be fair and square, because the shops and money's all yours. But, sir—" he hesitated, and then went on bluntly—"I did think you'd ought to divide with us some of that money you're giving away."

"I think so, too," said Mr. Brock, "and I have brought your share."

Joe took the proffered check, and confusedly stammered: "It's—it's—"

"It's sufficient to make the boy well," concluded his employer.

"God bless you, sir!" quivered Joe. "You don't know what this means to me, sir."

"Yes, I do. I have a boy of my own; and I thought, suppose my Albert were—"

He broke off abruptly. There was a convulsive handclasp; and then the boss hurried away, and Joe tiptoed quickly up the creaking stairs to his waiting wife.

Jesus Betrayed and Denied

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

IN 1904 eight hundred and seventeen Sunday School teachers went on the "Jerusalem Cruise." Many lands were visited by that company—Greece, Turkey, Syria, Egypt, Italy and France—but to hold a World's Sunday School Convention in Jerusalem was the purpose for which the journey was made. The delegates from the United States were joined by nearly as large a company from England, and there were also delegates from many lands, making a company of nearly nineteen hundred in all, when the great convention assembled in the immense tent, almost under the shadow of Calvary, near the Garden Tomb, and in sight of the Mount of Ascension.

Some of them went early one Sabbath morning to the Garden Tomb, "as it began to dawn toward the day," and afterwards climbed the Mount of Olives under the guidance of an aged woman, who was a Russian pilgrim, and then, after reaching the summit of the mountain, holding a sunrise prayer-meeting with a company of Sunday School friends who had also sought the mountain top.

In the Garden

After the prayer-meeting they descended the mountain and stopped at Gethsemane to hold a service there. One enters the garden through a low door, in a high wall, descending three or four steps. The space enclosed is about seventy feet square. In the centre of the garden is a clump of eight very old olive trees, surrounded by a picket fence. It is sometimes claimed that these are the very same trees under which Jesus prayed. But this can hardly be true, as the Roman general Titus ordered all trees to be cut down when Jerusalem was subdued by his army in A.D. 70. The trees now seen have in all probability grown from the roots or seeds of those trees. Between the trees simple flowers are cultivated by the monks to sell to visitors. Between the high outside wall and the picket fence is a walk four or five feet wide, entirely around the garden. In the high wall at about equal distances are seven niches about three feet square; in these are represented the "seven stations of the Cross," in painting and relief: 1st. Pilate's judgment hall. 2d. The place of the binding of the cross upon the shoulders of Christ. 3d. The place where Christ sank under the cross. 4th. The impression of Christ's shoulder as he leaned for support. 5th. The house of St. Veronica, who wiped the brow of our Saviour. 6th. The spot where Jesus said, "Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me, but for yourselves." 7th. The place where Jesus is said to have met his mother.

Christ's Agony

On the right side of the wall as you enter is a cross, probably nine or ten feet high. There are fastened on it small-sized objects, which represent the crown of thorns, the nails which were driven into Jesus' hands and feet, the super-scription put above his head, the sponge with which wine was offered to him, the spear with which his side was pierced, the dice with which the Roman soldiers cast lots for his garments, etc. We wish that the wall had no niches in it, and no pictures, and that even the cross was not there. Such things only detract from the sad sublimity of the place, for, above and beyond all, it is the most sacred spot on earth, for there was the spiritual crucifixion of Christ when he sweat drops of blood, and prayed: "O my Father, if it be possible let this cup pass from me."

It was to this retired spot that Jesus went after he had spoken his farewell discourse to his apostles, and prayed on their behalf as recorded in the fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth and seventeenth chapters of John. . . . They crossed the brook Kedron, running between the Mount of Olives and the mountains on which Jerusalem is built, "where was a garden, into which he entered, and his disciples." It was the Garden of Gethsemane, not a garden of fruits or flowers, but rather a grove of olive trees, on the slope of Mount Olivet. "Jesus oftentimes resorted there with his disciples"; such instances are recorded in John 8: 1; Luke 21: 37; 22: 39.

The Treason of Judas

We shall miss the most important teaching in the tragedy of Judas, whose last pages, stained with murder and suicide, we are now about to turn, if we do not clearly recognize that his great crimes were not reached at a bound, but by a slow descent, as of a ladder round by round. "We pity him all along, for he is not represented as wholly and irredeemably bad, but only as a man who has no faith and no enthusiasm." All the apostles had followed Christ, partly because they thought he was the Messiah who would not only deliver the nation from the Romans, but also provide his chief followers with lucrative offices. Peter said to Christ: "We have left all, and followed thee; what shall we have therefore?" But selfishness in the other apostles was not allowed to become a ruling passion, as it became in Judas. Other apostles might be thought love-blind. This heartless witness could not be accused of being carried away by "sentiment." Judas worked his plans to get the office of treasurer, probably not admitting yet, even to himself, that he would misappropriate the funds for the poor. Having the money in hand, he stole (John 12: 6), but so prudently that none but Christ knew it, or he would have been dismissed.

Consummating the Plot

When Mary of Bethany poured upon the feet of Christ spikenard of value equal to a year's wages, it was to the covetous soul of Judas as if some one had snatched so much gold out of his own hand. And when his criticism of the "waste" was also condemned by Christ it was like a second stab to the heart. His dishonesty and insincerity made him the more sensitive. A man does not "get mad" at a rebuke when there is no truth in it. Still, for three days Judas does not consummate the betrayal, of which at first he only dares to think. There was, no doubt, many a battle with conscience. He probably said to himself that he had been deceived in thinking Christ would have earthly rewards to give, and was justified in making what he could while taking revenge also for the rebuke. He perhaps argued that Christ would use his miraculous powers to save himself, so that no real harm would be done, and he would have the money.

So hesitating, yet dragged on by his love of money, he went on Wednesday to the plotting priests. Why did they give so little—only the price of a slave—thirty fifty-cent dollars? Was it not because Judas could give them nothing but Christ's body—no proof of fraud or sin by which they could kill his claims to be the Messiah with the multitudes that believed in him? No doubt Judas remembered the treachery of his ancestor in selling Joseph into slavery as the slave price was offered him, but the clink of the coin was the sound of his chain, the chain of covetousness in which he had become entrapped, and which would soon drag him to his death, like the magnificent eagle, born to soar above the mountain, dragged within range of a hunter's rifle by a steel trap in which his foot had become entangled.

This lesson presents—

1. The fruit of covetousness in Judas.
2. The selfishness of Christ.
3. The folly and fear of the apostles.

Jesus knew when he crossed the Kedron to go into the Garden of Gethsemane, that the crisis of his life had arrived.

Sunday School Lesson—Continued

is suffering and death were very near, but he did not hesitate. He knew that Judas was bringing the officers upon him at night, but he would not avoid them. Through humiliation and death the path led to the crown. All this he knew when he crossed the Kedron. Julius Caesar, the military commander of a province only, marching toward Rome, paused at the Rubicon, the boundary of his command. To cross it would mean revolt and a change in the government of Rome, or his own execution. He made his choice and crossed, and became ruler of the world. Christ knew in crossing the Kedron that he was going both to the cross and the conquest of the world. For the way set before him in the world's redemption he accepted the cross, despising the name.

The Betrayal

"Judas also knew the place." What masterpieces of hypocrisy we see in this hole proceeding! The chief priests of most punctilious religion plot a murder, in which the ringleader is to be an apostle, who, with crime in his heart, joyously eats a meal with his victim, and then leads the "temple police," with Roman soldiers also, to Christ's well-known place of secret prayer. Nor is it probable that the priests were conscious of any hypocrisy or inconsistency. Even Judas, we may be sure, had some excuse which he then thought sufficient. Therefore, let no one to-day suppose he may not be committing some treachery because he is not conscious of it.

"Let these go their way." What a sublime picture of the true nobility of selfishness this is in contrast with the supreme covetousness of Judas! As the company of Roman soldiers and temple officers march into Gethsemane with Judas at their head, Jesus, strengthened by prayer and angel ministries, steps forth and says: "Whom seek ye?" They answer: "Jesus the Nazarene." To which he replied fearlessly: "I am he." And then, as if to show them he could yet save himself if he would, he causes those who seek his life to fall back and fall down. But he did not wish to save his life or destroy the life of others, and so yielded to arrest after making this display of miraculous power. But in sacrificing himself he sought to save his apostles, saying: "If ye seek me, let these go their way." This spirit of Christ, forgetting ourselves while we seek to help others, was beautifully illustrated in the story of the newsboy who supported a lame brother that "couldn't earn much himself," as the newsboy explained to a kind old gentleman who asked about his name. "Ah! that makes it hard," said the gentleman. "You could do better alone." "No, I couldn't. Jim's somebody to go home to; he's lots of help. What would be the good of having luck, if nobody was glad? Or of getting things, if there was nobody to divide with?"

A Lesson of Prayer

Jesus was strengthened by prayer. Men of science said, years ago, that DeLesseps' scheme for opening up a way of water communication between the Red Sea and the Mediterranean was absurd and "physically impossible." The picks and spades of DeLesseps' workmen have long since buried these objections. These same men of science pronounced as an absurd impossibility the Bible theory that the lake of the human spirit and the ocean of the divine spirit can and do connect by the canal of prayer. But Christian hearts made the experiment, and lo! the blessing for which they sent their empty ships of supplication through the canal of prayer come back from God richly laden with what they asked or something better. The theory of the infidel is buried by the thousands of well-attested answers to prayer.

This canal between the heart-lake and the ocean of the Infinite Soul, "how often we have sailed along its waters propelled by the wind of the Spirit in the starlight of a thousand promises during our nights of suspense and sorrow!" And what a company of earth's greatest princes have recognized this canal of prayer: Moses, Samuel, David, Solomon, William of Orange, Washington, Gladstone, Bismarck, Lincoln, Webster, Garfield, besides the thousands of less celebrated men who are "kings unto God."

The superintendent of Bethlehem Royal Hospital in London comes forward with the declaration that prayer is the best remedy for mental distresses of all sorts. He said at the recent annual meeting of the British Medical Association: "As an alienist, and one whose whole life has been concerned with the sufferings of the mind, I would state that of all hygienic measures to counteract disturbed sleep, depressed spirits, and all the miserable sequels of a distressed mind, I would undoubtedly give the first place to the simple habit of prayer. Let there but be a habit of nightly communion, not as a mendicant or repeater of words more adapted to the tongue of a sage, but as a humble individual who submerges or asserts his individuality as an integral part of a greater whole. Such a habit does more to clean the spirit and strengthen the soul to overcome mere incidental emotionalism than any other therapeutic agent known to me."

Principal J. W. Dawson has said: "A naturalist should be the last man in the world to object to the efficacy of prayer, since prayer is itself one of the most potent of natural forces. The cry of the young raven brings its food from afar without any exertion on its part, for that cry has power to move the emotions and muscles of the parent bird, and to overcome her own selfish appetite. The bleat of the lamb not only brings its dam to its side, but causes the secretion of milk in her udder. The cry of distress nerves men to all exertions, to brave all dangers, and to struggle against all or any of the laws of nature that may be causing suffering or death. Nor in the case of prayer are the objects attained at all commensurate with the mechanical activities set in motion. We have all seen how the prayer of a few captives wrongfully held in durance by some barbarous potentate, may move mighty nations and cause them to pour out millions of their treasure to send men and material of war over land and sea, to sacrifice hundreds of lives, in order that a just and proper prayer may be answered. In such a case we see how the higher law overrides the lower, and may cause even frightful suffering and loss of life, in order that a moral or spiritual end may be gained. Are we to suppose, then, that the only being in the universe who cannot answer prayer is that one who alone has all power at his command?"

A Friend of the Armenians

The late W. N. Stonehill, D.D., of the East Side Parish Methodist Episcopal Church of All Nations, New York City, was a staunch friend of the persecuted Armenian people. His widow lately received a letter of condolence from an Armenian church at Paterson, N. J., in which this passage occurs: "We have heard of Dr. Stonehill's practical preaching to the nations of the world and specially his love for the poor Armenian nation. In the personality of this real benefactor, we have lost a very Christian friend. Yesterday we had a touching memorial service conducted by our brother, Rev. A. B. Saroyon, who had the honor to know him, and who told us of his self-sacrifice for the poor and oppressed. May the hope of eternal life and the consolation of the Spirit comfort you and enable you to realize the blessing of that Gospel, preached so bravely by our dear brother, Dr. Stonehill."

ROOFING

BETTER Than Shingles

THOUSANDS of people buy shingles for their roofs rather than face the prospect of painting a ready roofing every year or two.

Shingles are expensive, but they are actually cheaper during ten years than a ready roofing which needs frequent painting to keep it free from leaks.

Amatite roofing costs less than half as much as shingles and does not need painting either. It is easier to lay and will give years of long hard service without any care.

Amatite has a real mineral surface. That's why it needs no painting. Once laid on your roof your building has real protection. Amatite is easier to lay than ever this year. The liquid cement for the laps does not require heating before use. A three-inch smooth margin is left at the edge of the sheet so that the laps will be tight fitting and easily cemented. The large headed nails which we furnish save fussing with caps, which rust easily.

Amatite is up to date.

Send for a Sample and look it over. You'll never buy any other.

Secretary Taft and the Missionaries

He Declares Them Guiltless of Provoking International Complications and Praises Their Work

AT the recent meeting held in Carnegie Hall, New York, under the auspices of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, Hon. Wm. M. Taft, Secretary of War, was one of the principal speakers. His theme was "Christianity in the Far East," and he spoke with the knowledge of one who has traveled much in the Orient and been a close observer of existing conditions. His address was a strong defense of the Christian missionaries. Instead of blaming them, as some had done, for being the cause of occasional international complications, he declared that not the preachers of the Gospel, but the advance agents or representatives of business houses in the West were really responsible for such troubles in a great majority of instances. We quote briefly from the Secretary's remarks:

"Western trade is pressing into the Orient, and its agents ahead are not always the best representatives of Western civilization. There are among them many who left the West for the good of the West and because their history might prove embarrassing to them at home.

"It was said that the Boxer war was the result of the meddling of missionaries. That is not true. The first outbreak was against the missionaries because they were the farthest in the country and the easiest to attack. But the attack was against foreign interference, and the Orientals had come to look upon us all as sitting waiting for the slicing up of the Chinese Empire. They thought we were all waiting for our piece of pork. I am not prepared to say that there was no ground for this suspicion.

"Until I went to the Orient, I did not realize the immense importance of foreign missions. We've got to wake up in this country. We are not the only people. There are lots of other people waiting for our endeavor, for our help, and our sacrifices. Christianity and the spread of it is the only basis for our hope of civilization. We are dependent upon Christianity in any hope we may have for uplifting the peoples thrust upon us.

"The only people who are Christians in the Orient are those of the Philippines. The old Mission Fathers kept them in a state of ignorance, perhaps, but nevertheless they kept them Christians. Their ideals are Christian ideals. They are fit material to make a self-governing people in two or three generations. My conviction is that our nation is just as much charged to help the unfortunates cast upon us as the wealthy of a community are to help the unfortunates in that community. I am talking practical facts about the effect of religion on political government, and I know what I am talking about. The work of foreign missions should be pressed forward."

Child Training*

ONLY a child, is the disparaging phrase with which some act or word of a little one is often dismissed. Yet that expression may be an index of character that ought to be studied; for in a few years those who are children to-day will be controlling and guiding the affairs of the world. As we stand outside a school-house as the children are dismissed, it is hard to realize that those romping, playful boys and girls will, thirty years hence, be in all the places of responsibility and trust. How they will act, whether wisely or foolishly, whether rightly or wickedly depends to a very large extent on what they are, and what they are being made, to-day. The parents and teachers, if they are not too much occupied with other matters, perceive traits and characteristics in their charges which need to be encouraged or repressed, but too often the child is allowed to go its own way, with no correction or training save that which is administered in caprice or in anger. What wonder is it if the child's nature, like a neglected garden, becomes full of weeds and poisonous growths? Those parents whose gray hair is brought in sorrow to the grave through the evil deeds of their children, are in only too many cases realizing the harvest of a neglected springtime.

On the other hand the child has enormous responsibility. Very early he learns that his future depends on the use he makes of his present. His eyes see clearly that the wrecks and ruins of society come from habits acquired in childhood. He soon sees that if he deceives his parents and gives himself to sin and wickedness, the consequences will fall on his own head. Well is it for him, then, if he sets himself to seek God, and gives the care of his life into the wise keeping of Him who will be the guide of his youth. The habits formed then will persist and goodness will become easier to him, as the years pass, than evil, and he will find that the path he has chosen leads to righteousness and peace.

Life's Calling*

WHAT is the supreme object in life? Some men make it the acquisition of wealth; some the attainment of high place in the world; some the acquirement of learning and it is possible for a man to succeed in any one of these, if he gives his undivided, unremitting attention to it. Of course some men are so handicapped by their own defects or by their circumstances that they fail, but in the vast majority of instances success is assured to undivided effort. It is, therefore, of the utmost importance to a young man that the object he pursues is one that will not disappoint him when it is attained, one in short that is worth the devotion of a life.

The choice which Paul says he made, is worth considering by every young man at the outset of his career. It was late in his life that the Apostle gives his verdict upon it. He had long ago chosen his calling or vocation. So deeply and resolutely did he follow it that he regards himself as being called, rather than as making his own choice. It had brought him the loss of all worldly good. It had involved him in suffering and hardship, but the result was worth all that he had missed. It compensated him for the loss of ease, of comfort, of luxury, of position, of friends and of all that the world esteems. This should be worth knowing. So often have men who pursued and attained other objects declared themselves disappointed, that the testimony of a man who declares himself satisfied is of the greatest value. Especially is it good when, as in this case, it is confirmed by all who have devoted themselves to the same pursuit. The world may be challenged to produce an aged Christian, who is not glad that he has followed the Apostle's example.

TRAINED NURSE

Remarks About Nourishing Food

"A physician's wife gave me a package of Grape-Nuts one day, with the remark that she was sure I would find the food very beneficial, both for my own use and for my patients. I was particularly attracted to the food, as at that time the weather was very hot and I appreciated the fact that Grape-Nuts requires no cooking.

The food was deliciously crisp, and most inviting to the appetite. After making use of it twice a day for three or four weeks, I discovered that it was a most wonderful invigorator. I used to suffer greatly from exhaustion, headaches and depression of spirits. My work had been very trying at times and indigestion had set in.

"Now I am always well and ready for any amount of work, have an abundance of active energy, cheerfulness and mental poise. I have proved to my entire satisfaction that this change has been brought about by Grape-Nuts food.

"The fact that it is predigested is a very desirable feature. I have had many remarkable results in feeding Grape-Nuts to my patients, and I cannot speak too highly of the food. My friends constantly comment on the change in my appearance. I have gained pounds since beginning the use of this food. 'There's a Reason.' Read 'The Road to Wellville,' in pkgs.

IN GETHSEMANE

By Mrs. M. Baxter

JESUS knew "all things that should come upon him," knew from the beginning who should betray him, yet he could go on with his teaching, and with the manifestation of his Father, in the constant presence of this man who he knew was "the son of perdition!" Nothing seems so impossible as to hold on in faith and love just when we are conscious of the presence of the devil in a meeting, in a household, or in a person. Yet it is just when we are most conscious of the power of the enemy that faith may be in most lively exercise. We cannot too often strengthen ourselves with the fact that Christ has destroyed him that had the power of death, even the devil (Heb. 2: 14)—that he is a conquered foe; not under our feet, but under Jesus' feet.

It was just after his last intercessory prayer for his disciples (John 17) that Jesus was betrayed. Straight from the most glorious communion with his Father, his heaven upon earth, Jesus went out to meet the devil in the person of his own disciple. What a contrast! "He went forth with his disciples over the brook Cedron, where was a garden, into the which he entered, and his disciples. And Judas also, which betrayed him, knew the place." What! then had Jesus no place shut out from the traitor among his disciples! No; the door into his presence, and into all his grace, stands open for all, even the most depraved; any one can get at Jesus. He knows no barred doors, all his life, all his Word, all his heart says, "Come"; "Come, sinner; come, backslider; come, traitor Judas, back to me."

Judas had laid his plans deep: the chief priests and Pharisees were glad enough to make common cause with him against his Lord; such an accession to their ranks, one of the very twelve, the bodyguard of Jesus, was the summit of their wishes. Yes; it needed this in order that they should succeed. In order that the machinations of Satan should succeed, it seems necessary that some child of God should subscribe to them. It was when the sons of God began to fail in the days of Noah, by their guilty marriages with the daughters of men, that the flood was brought upon the world of the ungodly. It was when a child of God had settled in the city of which the men were "wicked and sinners before the Lord exceedingly" (Gen. 13: 13), that Sodom was doomed to be destroyed.

It is a fearful thing when God's children are in league with the enemies of Jesus, when those who hate God count on the influence of God's children as on their side. The men of Sodom counted Lot as one of them, and when he spoke to his sons-in-law "he seemed as one that mocked," his words fell powerless. Ahab counted on Jehoshaphat with him in his attack upon Ramoth-Gilead; and Jehoshaphat nearly lost his life, and met with the severe rebuke, "Shouldst thou help the ungodly, and love them that hate the Lord? therefore is wrath upon thee from before the Lord" (II. Chron. 19: 2). But all this was nothing to the defection of Judas, who had been called to be with Jesus, to preach, to heal, and to cast out devils, in his name; and who now plotted with his Master's enemies—and for what? thirty pieces of silver!

Are there not among the disciples of Jesus more than a few who in business are found among the ranks of the enemies of Jesus, playing into their hands by acting unrighteously? Many things which are done in the way of business cannot bear the light. "Everybody does the same" is the business man's plea; and under the respectable name of "business" many converted men—who wish to be considered disciples of Jesus—can cheat and lie!

Called Higher

Samuel Burnham, of Moorhead, Minn., entered into rest after a consistent Christian life. He was nearly eighty-five years of age.

Mrs. L. J. Byers has been called higher from her home in Nickerson, Kan. She was a member of the Methodist Church and long a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mrs. Emily Callen Hunter died near St. Meinrad, Ind., aged eighty-four years. She was a member of Polk Run Presbyterian Church. She and her husband, Robert A. Hunter, who survives her, have for many years been subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Martha J. Carr, of Anderson, Ind., at the age of seventy-five years, has entered into rest. She had long been an invalid. She was a constant reader of her Bible and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. She united with the Presbyterian Church at the age of seventeen years.

Triumphant in her faith in her Redeemer, Mrs. Ruth Delzell, wife of William B. Delzell, entered into rest at Santa Rosa, Calif. She was nearly seventy years old. Since early childhood she had devoted her life consistently to the cause of Christ. She loved THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mrs. Ida (Frame) Crow entered into rest at Cambridge, O. She had just entered a new home and also a new church home, the United Presbyterian. But the Master came and called for her. Bible reading and secret prayer were her daily practice. She enjoyed reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and especially the Answered Prayers.

Miss Margaret Cummings has passed to the great beyond from her home in Cecil County, Md., at the age of seventy-two years. She was a member of the Presbyterian Church and an active Sunday School worker. She had long been a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. She died peacefully after a life filled with good deeds.

Mrs. Eliza Rodgers Hill has fallen asleep in Jesus at her home in Knoxville, Tenn. She was for years a devoted reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and watched each week for its coming with great eagerness. Mrs. Hill was eighty years of age and was beloved alike by young and old, and she numbered her friends by those who knew her. Many souls have been won to Christ through her prayers and influence. Her whole heart went out to the temperance cause, and though feeble, she was one of the faithful workers at one of the voting places in the city when Knoxville decided the fate of the whisky traffic in this locality. She was one of the "sweet, old-fashioned mothers." She leaves a husband, two sons and three daughters to mourn her loss.

Mrs. Sarah A. Shaw, of Kingsley, Mich., was called to the better land a few weeks ago. She was born February 7, 1839, at Groton, Tompkins County, N. Y. Her parents were Nathaniel and Anna Loomis. In April, 1868, she married William Shaw. They moved to the State of Michigan in 1874, and lived in Wexford County for some time. About twenty-five years ago they moved to Kingsley, Mich. Mrs. Shaw was taken ill over two years ago, but showed great Christian fortitude in her suffering. She always had a pleasant smile for all who came to see her, and never complained. Her life was an influence for good on all who were fortunate enough to know her. She was active in church work and long a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. She is survived by her husband, two brothers and two sisters, who live in New York State. A little daughter went before in 1874. After her death the following verses were found under her pillow:

The eyes that crave for our smile
Or the ears for our kindly word
May be closed in a little while
And our loudest cries unheard.
Time mocks at our cold delay.
Death waits not, though we wait,
So make haste to be kind to-day,
To-morrow may be too late.
Why should we for the dying weep?
They do not die, they only sleep.
'Tis not the soul, 'tis but the shell
We bury with the funeral knell.
This sorrowing life, thank God, is brief,
But that's eternal; why this grief?

Tell All Your Troubles to Jesus

TELL all your troubles to Jesus,
His sympathy reaches so wide;
He well understands without telling,
But blessed it is to confide.
He holdeth you close to his bosom,
And biddeth your sorrow to cease;
He whispers of joy everlasting,
He whispers of comforting peace.

Tell all your troubles to Jesus,
A wonderful Saviour is he;
He went to the depths of all sorrow,
And knoweth the strength of your plea.
Oh, surely 'twill help you to tell him,
And lean on the arm of his might;
He promised his yoke should be easy,
His burden, he said, should be light.

Tell all your troubles to Jesus,
Our pitiful Saviour so strong,
Abundantly able to help you,
And willing to banish the wrong.
Oh, deem not that you are forgotten,
Though weeping your sight may bedim,
But tell all your troubles to Jesus,
For there is compassion with him.

Are You Too Thin?

For only 15 minutes a day's practice in your own room upon special exercises that I will give, you can be round, plump, wholesome, rested and attractive. Nature intended you to be—why should you not?
A pupil who was thin writes me:

Miss Cocroft at Her Desk

"I just can't tell you how happy I am! I wore low neck and short sleeves the other night and I was so proud of my neck and arms! My bust is rounded out and I have gained 24 lbs. it has come just where I wanted it and I carry myself like another woman. My old dresses look stylish on me now. You remember I have not been constipated since my second lesson and I had taken something for years. I guess my stomach must be stronger now, for I sleep like a baby and my nerves are so rested I feel as if I had missed so much enjoyment in life, for I never did have such good times before. I feel so well all the time."

I have built up thousands of women—why not you? You will be so much better satisfied with yourself and more attractive to your friends.

I will cheerfully tell you about my work, and if I cannot help your particular case I will tell you so. My information and advice are entirely free.

FRIENDS HELP

St. Paul Park Incident.

"After drinking coffee for breakfast I always felt languid and dull, having no ambition to get to my morning duties. Then in about an hour or so a weak, nervous derangement of the heart and stomach would come over me with such force I would frequently have to lie down.

"At other times I had severe headaches; stomach finally became affected and digestion so impaired that I had serious chronic dyspepsia and constipation. A lady, for many years State President of the W. C. T. U., told me she had been greatly benefited by quitting coffee and using Postum Food Coffee. She was troubled for years with asthma. She said it was no cross to quit coffee when she found she could have as delicious an article as Postum.

"Another lady, who had been troubled with chronic dyspepsia for years, found immediate relief on ceasing coffee and beginning Postum twice a day. Still another friend told me that Postum Food Coffee was a godsend to her, her heart trouble having been relieved after leaving off coffee and taking on Postum.

"So many such cases came to my notice that I concluded coffee was the cause of my trouble, and I quit and took up Postum. I am more than pleased to say that my days of trouble have disappeared. I am well and happy." "There's a Reason." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Questions and Answers

Wm. Witt, Nebraska. I am a Methodist but am now connected with a Baptist church. I cannot be a full member without baptism by immersion. Ought I to be baptized in that way?

Why need you hesitate? Even if you do not approve of that mode, it can do you no harm, and it appears that it will add to your usefulness. Paul did not consider circumcision necessary, but he caused Timothy to be circumcized (Acts 16: 3). His rule stated (I. Cor. 9: 20-23) is of general application. You will do wisely to yield to the opinions of others, even when they are not your own, if they do not conflict with the word of God, when you perceive that you may gain or do spiritual good by yielding.

L. M. B., Phoebus, Va. If a Turkish subject becomes a citizen of this country and returns to his native land, is he protected by the government of the United States, and does the Turkish government recognize him as an American citizen, provided, of course, he has not committed any crimes against the government of his native land?

He is entitled, of course, to all the rights and privileges of a naturalized American citizen. If, however, he uses his citizenship as a ground of offense to other governments with which the United States has harmonious relations, he will experience trouble. This has happened in several cases with subjects of the Sultan who, becoming naturalized here, return to make trouble in their native land.

S. H. R., Pleasant Valley, Pa. Will the physical body now have be brought together at the resurrection?

We cannot limit the power of God, so that we shrink from saying it is impossible, though it appears so to human reason. Paul does not seem to have expected it. The long argument on the subject (I. Cor. 15) implies that he expected to receive a spiritual body which would be far superior to the one laid in the grave. On the other hand, Christ had the same body after his resurrection, and his resurrection is a type of ours.

Mr. H. B. Irving, of Brooklyn, writes calling attention to certain facts recently placed on record in connection with the dispute with Venezuela. Statements which have been presented to Congress by ex-Secretary of State Foster in defense of Venezuela, and made public since our article published on April 15 was written, present the conduct of Venezuela in a new light. As Mr. Irving says, the fact that the American Asphalt Company "fomented, financed and promoted a revolution against the government of Venezuela is some justification for its being fined and cast out. In other countries the trust would not have got off so easily." Mr. Irving also calls attention to the fact, now disclosed, that all contracts made by Venezuela with foreign companies contain a clause pledging the companies to submit any disputes that may arise to Venezuelan courts, and to accept the decisions of those courts as final. These facts were not generally known until Mr. Foster presented the case and they deserve to be thoroughly investigated before any hostile measures are taken against Venezuela.

Reader, Marionville, Mo. You mention several afflictions that may have been the "thorn in the flesh" that Paul refers to in II. Cor. 12: 7, but not the one that to my mind is the most probable. Is it not likely that it was an involuntary impulse of the mind—a suggestion from the evil one—to commit suicide, or to do some other evil deed? Such a suggestion comes to some good people now and is overcome only by the power that came to Paul, assuring him that God's grace was sufficient for him.

Such persons, of whom there are many, have our deepest and most sincere sympathy. Bunyan, in his Pilgrim's Progress, describes Christian as being harassed by such suggestions, and by hearing foul blasphemies, which he was led to think he had uttered himself. The only sure defense is that you mention—instant and earnest prayer. The suggestions gradually lose their power when it becomes clear that the poor persecuted creature knows where to obtain strength to resist. This trial is severe, but it does not appear to our mind to correspond with the case of the apostle, whose affliction was evidently a humiliating one to keep him from "being exalted above measure."

Rev. Robert Wodehouse, of the M.E. Mission at Umtali, South Africa, has sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the portraits of twelve trained native African preachers who are candidates for support on the "native missionary substitute plan," as the personal field representatives of American patrons. Mr. Wodehouse writes us: "They are all good men, converted and trained, and at present doing splendid work at various sta-his second prevarication (Gen. 20: 2), and perhaps his unbelief of the promise about Isaac when it was first given (Gen. 17: 17).

L. E., Watertown, N. Y. Did Paul intend by I. Cor. 6: 5 to prohibit lawsuits?

So far as might relate to disputes between Christians. He would have them arbitrated by some member of the church chosen for the purpose. He was anxious that the young church might appear to the world as composed of men who loved one another. In this he was in accord with the teaching of Christ. (See Matt. 5: 40.)

B. F. R., Hazleton, Pa. What is Congress doing about restoring the motto?

Nothing has yet been done by the Senate looking to the passage of the bill which was recently adopted by the House of Representatives. We hope, however, to see the measure taken up and passed in the Senate also.

country, Arizona, and in other parts of the far Southwest. In an article in the National Geographic Magazine, Prof. C. Blanchard describes some of these remarkable dwellings, which were the homes of a semi-civilized people. Among them are monster structures with frowning turrets, surrounded by miles of canyons and by once fertile valleys. There were all the indications of a great population whose work disclosed "craftsmanship and patience and rivaled in some degree work of modern engineers." One of the prehistoric ruined buildings is known the Cheltro Palace. It is 449 feet long, 250 feet wide and four stories high. It is said to be the most famous and stupendous ruin in America.

H. A. W., Daretown, N. J., writes: My father enjoys THE CHRISTIAN HERALD very much, as he is not now able to go to church. He is eighty-one years old.

We are always glad to hear from our old friends, and especially from those venerable Christians to whom old age comes like a crown of glory. The presence of an aged saint is a benediction in the house. It brings us closer to heaven.

R. S., Brooklyn, N. Y. What is speculum metal?

It is an alloy of one part tin, two parts copper and a very little arsenic. It is brittle, hard and white in color. It was formerly much used to make the mirror in reflecting telescopes, but has been a most superseded by silvered glass.

Reader, Madison, N. Y. When was Syracuse University founded?

It was founded in 1870 and is a continuation of Genesee College, founded in 1849. The medical department is successor to the Geneva Medical College, which dated back to 1835.

A. D., East Hampton, L. I. What are the four forest cantons?

They are Uri, Schwyz, Unterwalde and Lucerne, all grouped about Lake Lucerne, in Switzerland.

H. L., Orange, N. J. How large is Georgian Bay in Lake Huron?

It is about fifty miles wide and one hundred and twenty miles long. Its shoreline is entirely within Ontario, Canada.

W. H. B., Newark, N. J. Why is the Crucifixion of Christ called Good Friday?

The word means, in this case, "holy," otherwise "Holy Friday," which is certainly appropriate to the anniversary of the Crucifixion.

Carrie M. S., Baltimore, Md., writes:

Concerning the expression, "In the midst of life we are in death" (mentioned in your paper April 22), I would say that Bartlett's Quotations, after quoting this sentence from the Prayer-book, adds the following note, which you may perhaps care to read: "This is derived from a Latin antiphon, said to have been composed by Notker, a monk of St. Gall, in 911, while watching some workmen building a bridge at Martinsbrucke, in peril of their lives. It forms the groundwork of Luther's antiphon, 'De Morte.'"

L. J. R., Akron, O. There is no reason why Christian people should not enjoy themselves. A Peace Memorial Window

ON Easter morning there was unveiled in the Metropolitan Temple, New York City, a window to the memory of General Ulysses Simpson Grant, and at the service on Sunday, April 26, the window was formally dedicated. The subject chosen is "Peace," and the inscription at the base of the window is, "Let Us Have Peace," the words of General Grant at the surrender of Appomattox. The subject is treated in an allegorical manner, the idea being to emphasize the desire for peace, which filled the heart of the great commander. The figures, the landscape, in fact the whole composition, is so arranged that it conveys the feeling that, the horrors and devastation of war being over, the blessed light of peace pervades all the land. In the centre of the window is shown an angel with wings outspread, and poised over a broken shield. The angel bears an olive branch. On the right is the figure of a warrior in armor, wearied and spent with the strain and havoc of strife and sheathing his sword. On the left is the mother with her child at her knee, and in the middle distance the shepherd again peacefully tending his flock, and the plowman tilling the soil. Across the blue sky is the bow of peace. The picture is framed with laurel, and near the top on scrolls are given the dates of the birth and death of General Grant, while on either side are shields showing the badges of the various army corps which fought throughout the Civil War under Grant. The artist is Mr. Charles Mente, whose drawings have frequently appeared in the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

In a character so eminent and beautiful we would rather dwell on his excellencies. We suppose, however, that you refer to his untruth about his wife (Gen. 12: 13); his relation with Hagar (Gen. 16: 4);

The President is understood to be ready to approve the bill when passed. CRUISING UNDER THE EQUATOR

MANY Americans are traveling down the west coast of South America now. They have been drawn thither by the American investments in mines and railways, so the majority of them are miners, railway men or commercial drummers, but there are also school teachers. I noticed this specially during a recent journey. The people of the South American countries want to learn English, but that should not keep Americans who expect to go there from learning Spanish.

I have always thought a voyage from Panama to Valparaiso the ideal sea trip, because the ocean is almost always so smooth that it takes a strong imagination to realize that there is such a thing as seasickness. Once in a while there is a swell which seems to come all the way from Australia; but even that is gentle, and rough seas are unknown.

For about 2,500 miles the voyage is through tropical waters; yet the sea bath which is to be had on the steamers is not a hot one, as in the Red Sea, for instance. Instead, it is apt to be invigoratingly cool; for the Antarctic or Humboldt Current sweeps all the way up to the equator. In Panama Bay frequently, and sometimes in the gulf of Guayaquil, there are very brilliant phosphorescent displays. During my recent voyage, one night I sat on deck and for hours watched the surface of the water glowing as though it were all afire.

One advantage about this west coast trip is that, after the first day or two, the ships are always in sight of land, so there is plenty of variety. For a couple of days it is very green land, because along the Ecuador coast and up the Guayas River the rains are very abundant and the vegetation is fresh all the year round. Some of the dwellings along the riverside are really very attractive to look at; but I always think that it must be pretty monotonous to live in them without change.

It is always interesting to know when the Line is crossed. Nobody at sea among sailormen ever speaks of the equator, and travelers themselves fall into the habit of calling it "the Line." When the American squadron was along the Chilean and Peruvian coast, the only talk was of being south of the Line where harmless pranks are permitted. When the equator is crossed going north more decorum is expected to be observed.

On the Atlantic side, when vessels cross the equator, the traditional shaving of Old Neptune usually is indulged in, and the sport is very enjoyable for those who escape being soused. On the west coast, the custom is not so common, though on some of the steamers the "crossing of the Line" is made a kind of sailors' holiday, in which the passengers join.

There is one sight along the coast of Peru which I believe cannot be seen in any other part of the world. This is the flock of a million birds, which hover over those waters and make their resting-places on the guano islands that have been created by them through many centuries. The birds are mostly pelicans, although along the southern coast there are vast numbers of cormorants. Many times I have seen the skies black with these pelicans, flying in a solid mass, and separating only when they dived to the waters below for fish. I often wondered how many of the birds there were that formed these feathered clouds, but it never occurred to me to place the number at 1,000,000, until a member of the United States Fish Commission, who is now employed under the Peruvian government, told me there were that many. Nor was he making a wild guess, for his statement was based on careful calculation. All the islands which the pelicans frequent are known, and the size of the flocks have been determined by something like actual measurement. When a flock of them rises a pretty good estimate can be made of the area of the air which they are covering, and it is not at all difficult to determine how many pelicans there are to a given square yard. So, with the number of square yards estimated with reasonable accuracy, the simple process of multiplication gives the total number of the pelicans. In this way, the numbers of all the flocks in the different localities have been judged, and I have no doubt that the calculation is correct. The Peruvian government, in order to protect the guano deposits, exercises great care to prevent the destruction of the pelicans.

There is not much along the northern coast of Peru except the sandy mountains with a few rivers breaking through to the sea and forming very luxurious valleys. But at Callao, which is the chief seaport, there is everything that goes to make a world's shipping centre, and there is an unusually fine harbor, as was made apparent recently, when the American squadron was there. Callao has a pretty park or plaza with some picturesque buildings around it. The most interesting place, however, is the English Club fronting the ocean, where the sea captains gather when they come ashore, and tell tales of all parts of the world.

In southern Peru, the coast range of mountains slopes gradually, and there are a number of very fertile valleys where cotton, sugar, alfalfa, Indian corn, and a great variety of fruit are raised. There are also very fine vineyards. At one place along this coast, there is a series of terraces so perfect that they seem to have been built by human agency; but

CHRIST'S Winnowing Fan

TEXT—Matt. 3:12
"His fan is in his hand"

IN one of Lowell's noblest and most enduring poems there is a phrase which serves admirably as exposition of this text, or, at least, as introduction to any intelligent discussion of it. It is in "The Present Crisis" that the poet-prophet of two democracies writes:

Backward look across the ages and the beacon-moments see,
That, like peaks of some sunk continent, jut through Oblivion's sea;
Not an ear in court or market for the low foreboding cry
Of those Crises, God's stern winnowers, from whose feet earth's chaff must fly:
Never shows the choice momentous till the judgment hath passed by.

Such crises frequently recur in history, and as often as they appear they serve indeed as "God's stern winnowers," separating the chaff from the good grain—first in the individual heart, and then in the life of the nation. Lowell was impelled to his great deliverance by the question of slavery, which at that time and for so long dwarfed every other into insignificance. That was a winnowing fan in very truth. Your war, when conflict could be no longer delayed, came as a fan—one of the terrible ones of history—winnowing every soul throughout the land. You hold in honor to this day the men who acquitted themselves faithfully in those years of heroic struggle, because in the hour of crisis they measured up to the standard of moral manhood. They had to choose, and they chose not by considerations of personal gain or loss, of safety or danger, but by reference solely to duty, patriotism, conscience and God. And whether they were States-rights men, or men whose conceptions were dominated wholly by the thought of a nation one and indivisible, you know very well that they whose names will shine for ever in this country's history were sifted out from the worthless, selfish and cowardly elements in the nation's life by the winnowing fan of immortal principle.

Moral Issues of the Day

There are moral issues in our day which serve as a winnowing fan. Peace or war is one of them. Nothing will ever extenuate the guilt of the Christian Church from age to age in its encouragement of war and the war spirit. Men lose their reason as soon as the feverish throbbing of the war drum is heard in the city and the war flags are flung wide to the breeze. They lose their Christianity as well. They blaspheme their Lord while still they name themselves by his name. It is possible for men to doubt many things concerning Jesus Christ. It is open to nobody to question whether he was or was not opposed to war and the war spirit. From his flawless humanity to his perfect divinity speculation busies itself with his wondrous personality. There is no speculation about his view of peace and war. There is no if nor but. Not for nothing has the reverent imagination of the ages fastened upon one of his great titles, "Prince of Peace." If the spirit of Christ is not in antagonism to the spirit of war then nothing was ever clear upon this earth, and nothing ever will be, and we had better abandon any attempt to understand anything. He is the "Prince of peace." And by your attitude to every national or international question, when possibilities of peace and war are involved, I see the winnowing of Him whose fan is in his hand.

Prohibition

The Temperance question is at the present moment a winnowing fan. In hundreds of counties and towns in different States of the Union men are being forced to take a side at the polls. The energy of Prohibition which has swept the South and part of the West, which has already come as far East as Illinois and reached North as far as Michigan and may yet spread to these States, has in the process of local option ranged the people on the side of the saloon or against it. And, if there were to be no manifest gain in sobriety for fifty years to come, it would still be to the signal advantage of the nation that men should be driven to commit themselves—yes or no; for or against the legalized traffic in demoralization, debauchery and death. There are many of us who have long ago concluded that, apart from Prohibition by legislative enactment, the simple question of personal habit, of abstinence from intoxicating liquor or drinking which we judge to be moderate, affords the same supreme test. Here is one of the colossal evils of all time, wrecking, ruining, ravaging, on every hand. You have seen manhood shorn of its glory and womanhood low in the dust. You have heard the cry of the widow and orphan, and the low, sad wail of agony sent up by breaking hearts. And the question whether in the sight of God and of his Christ you can continue to be responsible to the extent of your own personal influence for the perpetuation of the infamies inseparable from the drinking habits of our time, is a subtle test piercing to bone and marrow. The issue cannot be avoided. You are on the side of the drinking habits of society, or you are against them; one or other; yes or no. His fan is in his hand.

These are specific and outstanding illustrations, concrete, definite, of a principle for ever at work in human life. There is one test which is constant: Christ is always in our midst. His fan is in his hand. It was John the Baptist who said this concerning him, but even before John's day it was declared that he should be a sign spoken against, and a divisive force in human life.

Free Will and Conscious Choice

He himself was fully conscious of this. In memorable phrases he declared that he had come to set at variance the members of the same families. He declared that a man's foes should be those of his own household. He said that he had come to fling fire on the earth. And to the very last moment of his existence his fan remained in his hand, winnowing the penitent from the impenitent, even as they hung with him upon their cross. So obvious has all this been in all generations that looking at it men have been blinded to the inner facts of free will and conscious choice. For instance, a great preacher once declared that any congregation to which he preached was only as a dust heap in which steel filings were hidden; the Gospel which he proclaimed was a magnet; the steel filings were irresistibly drawn; the heap of dust remained quiescent. It was not flattering to the congregation—most of us regard ourselves as something better than a speck of dust in a heap of waste material, and it is not true to the facts of our nature. It leaves out of account that mysterious force which is our real self, which makes you you and me me. Emerson's plea is nearer to the eternal facts of things:

So nigh is grandeur to our dust,
So near is God to man,
When duty whispers low, "Thou must!"
The youth replies, "I can!"

And Christ's call serves in this way supremely as the test. You are winnowed out as you answer, or fail to answer, "I can! Here am I! Send me!"

What is the fan, precisely? It is the call to each human heart, and it serves its purpose unaided by secular machinery or ecclesiastical organization. It is effective because it is what it is. There is in it nothing which can appeal to the frivolous, the selfish, or the insincere. Or if, strangely misconceiving the nature of Christ's kingdom and his invitation, they respond, they find nothing which is permanently attractive, and they fall away. The happiness which Christianity offers has no charm for such as they.

The Joy of True Service

Are you capable of finding the joy of life in human service? Are you one who can be happy so long as you are making others happy? Would it be enough for you to bring smiles to sad faces and wipe the tears from sorrowful eyes? And if you saw that men and women and little children marked your coming, and that their eyes grew brighter when you came; if you saw that some little corner of this earth was a better spot to live in because of you—would that be enough? Or must you follow after the things which this world counts prizes, and push your way and fight your way to wealth or place or power, reckless of cost to your own soul and of consequence to mankind? These questions go very deep, and according to the answer which our life gives does the fan which is in his hand winnow chaff from grain in this congregation and in all the world.

Christ's call is a call to conflict. In a violent metaphor he once declared that he had come not to bring peace but a sword. I understand him to mean that the Christian life cannot exist in an atmosphere of servile acquiescence in the world's wrong-doing. The peace which he condemns is the peace which is purchased at the price of conscience. The sword which he approves is the spirit which bids us strike and thrust at every evil which rears its head in opposition to the kingdom of virtue and love. But this is a vastly different thing from conflict for personal ends. That is savagery. This is immortality. Here is sublimity when men and women lose themselves in a righteous cause. They know not hunger, nor thirst, nor any heat. They serve him in his temple. And the blackest night of the year to them is still the shining day of the Lord. Do you remember Charles Kingsley's valorous plea—

Who would sit down and sigh for a lost age of gold
While the Lord of all ages is here?
The true heart will leap up at the trumpet of God,
And the soul that can suffer can dare.
Each old age of gold was an iron age, too,
And the meekest of saints can find stern work to do
In the day of the Lord at hand.

Are you capable of response to such a call as this?

The World's Hope

The soul of Christianity is the hope of a world redeemed. During these last days our thoughts have centered round the Cross erected on Calvary. We have heard again the words spoken by the Redeemer of the world. Those last syllables spoken by the Son of God, what did they mean? "It is finished." Was it the sigh of a broken heart? Was it the utter weariness of the human soul freed at last from this burden of mortal suffering? Or was it the triumph-cry of the world's work done, the world's salvation won—the triumph-cry of the immortal Victor over mankind brought back to God? The unknown author of the letter to the Hebrews, in a passage of wonderful beauty, declares that for the joy that was set before him he endured the Cross and despised the shame. What was that joy but this which I am trying so feebly to represent to you?—the joy of knowing that henceforth there was opened a true and living way by which the race might journey home to God; the joy of knowing that the stubborn heart of man was to yield at last to the gracious, pathetic pleading of the Father-heart and the whole wide world was to be every way bound by gold chains about the feet of God? Are you one who can share this hope? Is there in it such charm, such fascination, such power, that in the strength of it you can live and love and labor; in the strength of it endure and suffer; in the strength of it crucify the desires of the spirit as you mortify those of the flesh; in the strength of it tread down baffling foes; and in the strength of it climb from height to height until you share the redemptive passion of your Lord? These again are the questions which Christianity addresses to you. If they find you, you will go forth to your work in the world clothed upon with Resurrection power. If not, you will drift away, for his fan is in his hand.

Acknowledging Christ

I look back upon the appeal which Christ made to his own day and to his own people. He stood before them an unknown figure. He was guaranteed by no authority which they respected. He was of humble birth. He came from the laboring classes. He spoke strange words. He made light of the traditions of the Church. He set at defiance its official chiefs. It seemed as though he would destroy the Temple itself. And through all he invited the people to himself, not to a system, a philosophy, an organization, but always to himself. "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden." "I am the Good Shepherd." "I am the Light of the World." "I have come that they may have life, and may have it in abundance." Response to an invitation couched in such terms called for courage, for originality, and for independence. Naturally, heredity, education, environment, social observance, all conflicted with his claims. And only ardent, enthusiastic, earnest men and women could be expected to take his side.

The conditions are not essentially different to-day. Conventional worship of him is common, fashionable even, so that the curious thing is for a well-bred person to say that he does not believe in Jesus Christ. But the sincere worship of mind and spirit is not so common, and it is not easy. The habit of submitting every question to his authority and of quietly avowing, in whatever company you may be, that you take your standard of social ethics not from the conventions of society but from Christ, is an effort of independence from which all but robust spirits shrink. Doubts are easy. Historical criticism, scientific materialism and the unthoughtful agnosticism of the day impede the flight of the soul to him, while the fear of being thought "odd," of acting in a way to cause the polite lifting of the eyebrows in surprise, and to bring the ill-suppressed smile of banter to the lips, operates to hold us back from the frank confession that we too are his disciples.

It is told of the Roman Christians in the early days of persecution and martyrdom that when their lives were offered to them on condition of recantation, when

OUR GREATEST NAVAL LAND PARADE

Rear-Admiral Thomas and U. S. Grant, Jr.

Some of the 100,000 Who Welcomed the Fleet

Commander Valentine S. Nelson

THE thousands of sailors who make up the complement of the big fleet which Admiral "Bob" Evans brought around Cape Horn and up the Pacific coast have not only seen, but they have been seen by scores of thousands of loyal American citizens who came to San Diego, Calif., from all parts of the country to join in the welcome which has been extended to the armada. The whole Western country is still talking about the wonderful parade in San Diego on Wednesday, April 15, for in that procession, with its dozens of bands discoursing martial music, was the greatest number of American sailors and marines ever known to be in line at one time—five thousand and over.

To get such an aggregation of men from the big cruisers lying a mile off shore into the cutters, tow them around into the bay and up to the disembarking wharf, a distance of nearly eight miles; to have the cutters unload their human freight, and for all these individuals to get into orderly battalions, ready for the parade, was in itself no small feat, but it was all accomplished under the direction of Commander Valentine S. Nelson, without a hitch, much to the admiration of the thousands who occupied vantage points along the shore for the purpose of witnessing this prelude to the parade.

As to the parade itself, who can adequately describe it? A picture in colors? Yes. Magnificent? Yes. These are some of the expressions from the hundred thousand and more who lined the route of the parade and looked upon the brigades of marines and sailors with their gay banners, which announced to the onlookers the ships to which each group belonged. Loyal hearts overflowed with enthusiasm at the sight, and cheers made throats grow hoarse as the pageant covered the long route from the water front to the crest in the big city park which had been selected as the scene of the ceremonies, when the freedom of the city was presented to Rear-Admiral Thomas in command of the fleet.

What a panorama this park presented at the close of the review! The thousands of sailors and marines, after passing the reviewing stand, were massed on one of the mesas, some distance away, while in the foreground were the school children of the city, who were because he was within Port Arthur when it surrendered to the Japanese; Frederick Palmer, and others. Rear-Admirals Thomas, Emory and Sperry and dozens of other naval officers of the big fleet; Lieutenant-General Adna R. Chaffee, retired; Governor James N. Gillett, of California, and his staff; Mayor John F. Forward, of San Diego, and other notables had their places on the reviewing stand and were as active in their cheering as the humblest citizen.

Tributes were paid to the city, its citizens, the school children, the grizzled veterans who had formed part of the parade, and in fact to every individual or group who had contributed to the success of the day, by the Governor and Admiral Thomas in their addresses. The mayor made the presentation speeches, when a magnificent jewel casket and a gold key, symbolic of the freedom of the city, were presented to Rear-Admiral Thomas, representing Rear-Admiral Evans, and also when medals were presented to the other admirals of the fleet. Besides these gifts, a magnificent sword was given to Admiral Thomas for Admiral Evans, by the veterans of the city, both Union and Confederate, as well as those of the Spanish-American War.

Floating above were great kites, one group bearing the letters of the word "Welcome," while others, in pairs, supported great American flags.

The manifest patriotism and welcome won the warmest words from the guests of honor. "Though a city of but 45,000 inhabitants, San Diego gave a celebration worthy of a metropolis," was the substance of one high officer's remarks, and in his estimate all who witnessed the day's events heartily concur.

to perform some intricate patriotic drills. A great grand-stand, overlooking the assembled crowds, was filled to overflowing, while the smaller stand used by the dignitaries presented a fairyland sight, with the gold-braided uniforms of the men and the magnificent gowns of the ladies. On this stand too were many journalists and special correspondents, among them Joaquin Miller, the "poet of the Sierras"; Richard Barry, the young correspondent who became famous

A FAMOUS CHURCHMAN DEAD

AFTER forty-six years' active service as rector of Trinity Parish, New York, the Rev. Dr. Morgan Dix died on April 29, at the ripe age of eighty-one years. He was sick only a short time. When it became apparent that death was near the Rev. Dr. Wells of Trinity Parish administered the communion and conducted the service for the dying. As the Episcopal service proceeded, and when the Lord's Prayer was reached, the dying man joined in with a strong, clear voice, repeating the words to the end. Half an hour later he became unconscious, and he passed away like one in sleep.

Dr. Dix was born in 1827. In his sermons and views he reflected the sturdy stock from which he came. He was recognized as one of the nation's most scholarly and intellectual preachers.

When a boy he fell under the influence of Bishop Horatio Potter, and naturally turned to the Church at an early age. His father was the well-known General John A. Dix, and his mother was a Miss Morgan, a woman of distinction and high social position. He was graduated from Columbia in 1848, and then entered the General Theological Seminary. On leaving there, he served as assistant in St. Mark's Church in Philadelphia. Dr. Dix next went abroad, and when he returned to New York became assistant rector to Dr. Berian of Trinity. On Dr. Berian's death, Dr. Dix became rector of the church in 1862, and plunged into his work resolutely. Besides his parish duties he did much literary work. His commentaries and sermons have been widely published. His talents in a literary way were recognized by the universities, and he held degrees from Oxford, Princeton, Harvard, Columbia, and the University of the South.

As a preacher, Dr. Dix was unusually serene in the pulpit. His methods were never sensational. He was outspoken against the sins of society. He preached the sanctity of the home, the inviolability of the marriage bond, and warned the world of its dangers from iconoclastic beliefs or disbeliefs. He commanded respect and attention for his views without ever encroaching upon sensationalism.

INDIA'S VICEROY ON THE FAMINE

From His Recent Address Telling of the Need and Explaining the Government Relief System

THE general position is at present as follows: The famine area comprises practically the whole of the United Provinces, some of the protected States in Central India, and parts of the Punjab, Bengal, the Central Provinces, and even Bombay. It covers approximately 150,000 square miles, somewhat more than Great Britain, Ireland and Belgium combined, with a population of roughly fifty millions; in other words, over one-twelfth of the area of India and one-sixth of its population are affected.

I have been told that some exception has been taken to raising a general fund for all India on the present occasion, on the ground that this is mostly United Provinces famine; but it is really much more than that, though the depth and extent of the distress in the United Provinces compared with that in the other local administrations has naturally focused public attention on that one particular part of India.

It is unnecessary to go into any great detail as to the character of the famine, but a few statistics may assist to explain the situation to the meeting. Over the whole affected area the loss of crops has been very great. In one division of the Punjab, for instance, the outturn of the autumn harvest was much less than one-sixth of the normal, and it is calculated that this means an actual loss of 200 lakhs (£1,383,000). For the whole of the United Provinces the autumn harvest was less than two-fifths of the normal, and the failure is, of course, considerably greater in the famine-stricken areas. The loss on rice and maize alone, the two great food crops, is estimated at fifteen crores of rupees (£10,000,000). According to the latest returns there are 1,410,181 persons in receipt of relief, namely, 1,261,509 in British India and 148,673 in the protected States, and though in January our hopes were raised by the excellent and widespread rain which fell over Northern and Upper India, when there seemed indeed some probability that the sowings for the spring harvest would be more extensive than the original forecast made out. Since then, unfortunately, no more rain has fallen, and we are receiving gloomy accounts of prospects of the next harvest, especially in the Punjab.

Recognizing as we must the existence of much unavoidable misery, it is reassuring to know that the experience gained in previous famines, and the development of remedial measures steadily carried on under the direction of my two distinguished predecessors, Lord Elgin and Lord Curzon, have placed the Government of India in a far better position to cope with widespread distress than they have ever been before, whilst the unprecedentedly liberal issue of agricultural advances, and the arrangements made for prompt suspensions of revenue, have been a distinguishing feature of the administration of this famine, and have put much heart into the people, who, in their turn, are facing the position with remarkable courage and determination. The conduct of the campaign by Sir John Hewett and his officers has been thoroughly practical and humane, and they deserve all praise.

It is quite true that the present famine cannot be compared to the last two great famines, either in respect to its extent or severity, but it has one distinguishing feature in which it remarkably differs from its predecessors. That feature is the very high range of the prices of food grains. They are much higher than in the great famine of 1900, and distinctly higher than in 1897, and though the laboring and artisan classes have to some extent been saved from distress by the gradually increased demand for labor in the last few years, and though cultivators in the fortunate position of having a surplus to sell have benefited by the rise in prices, there is, on the other hand, an actually larger number than in former years of respectable poor people whom custom and tradition forbid to apply for Government relief. To these the prohibitive prices mean the most terrible distress and suffering.

Earl of Minto, Viceroy of India

I believe it has been asserted that if Government admit their responsibility for saving life and for keeping together the bodies and souls of the suffering people until brighter times come round, there is no necessity to draw on private benevolence for assistance. I am afraid I cannot agree. In spending the money of the Indian taxpayer on famine relief, Government must, in justice to that taxpayer, act on certain fundamental, and in accordance with certain recognized rules. Such limitations are imperative in any expenditure of public money, and in its self-appointed task of saving life the State must be strictly bound by them. But this restriction of the functions of Government leaves a very large margin of misery and suffering untouched.

Already private charitable relief agencies are at work in different parts of India. They are, I know, doing good work, and those in charge of them are freely devoting their time and labor to the interests of their distressed fellow countrymen. There have been examples of princely generosity, such as the grants already made to the United Provinces and Central India from the Famine Endowment Fund of the Maharaja of Jaipur whilst many Indian landlords, notably the Maharaja of Balrampur, are providing for famine relief in their own estates with admirable care and completeness. But separate efforts, no matter how munificent, are after a limited, and the time has come for the general public to occupy the larger field open to charity, and to undertake the organization necessary to ensure that public benevolence should be a fellow worker with the State. In this view I would outline the objects on which charitable funds will be spent. Firstly, in supplementing the subsistence ration which is alone provided from public funds, by the addition of small comforts, whether of food or of clothing, for the aged or the infirm, for patients in hospital, for children and the like. Secondly, in providing for the maintenance of orphans. Thirdly, in relieving the numerous poor but respectable persons who will endure almost any privation rather than apply for Government help, the relief of such cases of destitution to be officially inquired into. Fourthly, in restoring to their original position, when acute distress is subsiding, those who have lost their all in their struggle for existence, and in giving them a fresh start in life. Expenditure from charitable funds upon such objects will, it is to be hoped, both supplement and aid at each critical stage of the famine what the Government can do for the relief of distress. It will cheer the hearts of workers in the relief camps by supplementing and varying the monotonous ration, and will give them strength to endure; it will assist thousands of destitute widows and orphans and women and children unable to accompany their husbands and fathers in search of relief; it will give a new chance of life to very many suffering from diseases incidental to famine, who would rather die than go to a public hospital, and whose recovery depends not so much on medical treatment as on diet; it will enable thousands of families, whose livestock has disappeared and whose grain stores are depleted, at the end of the famine to make a fresh start with cattle and agricultural implements, and will save them from lapsing into poverty.

The following resolution was unanimously passed: "That this meeting recognizes the fact that the time has come when a charitable fund should be formed for the relief of distress in the famine-stricken districts of India, such relief being supplementary to the operations of Government, and designed to meet cases not clearly or adequately covered by those operations; and that to this end subscriptions should be invited from the well-to-do throughout this country, and contributions from abroad should be thankfully received."

Teaching Native Arts in India

YOUNG people in India owe a great debt of gratitude to the hard-working, self-sacrificing missionaries, even though some of them have not yet been persuaded to adopt the Christian faith taught by these workers "from over the sea." While the missionaries make the propagation of the Gospel their main task, they have been able to teach at the same time useful occupations for which there is a demand in the vicinity of their stations, and the scholars in the schools go out well equipped for the battle of life.

Many of these students who go to outlying villages are looked up to for the practical knowledge they have acquired and the message of a better life and religion that they bring is consequently listened to with more respect. They often become teachers, and in this way heathen boys and girls have acquired a knowledge of the trades taught by the American missionaries.

India for many centuries was famous for its beautiful embroideries, done in colored silks and picked out here and there with gilt and silver strands. Even so far back as the sixteenth century these embroidered hangings found their way into Europe, imported by the merchants of Venice in the high-decked galleons whose shipmasters braved the typhoons of the Indian Ocean to seek the beautiful products of Oriental art.

The missionaries have found that many of the older girls under their instruction are very skilful with their fingers, and with a few lessons are able to begin the embroidering of quite elaborate designs. On the cover of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a picture of several pupils at their embroidery lesson. They need no urging, for all enjoy working with the brightly colored threads. A door curtain is being finished, the design being one long used in India. Back of them in the doorway hangs a curtain entirely made by the pupils. It is of a most striking and artistic design. The embroidered archway about the central panel is almost Moorish in effect and reminds one of the door hangings found in some of the Moorish palaces of Spain, notably the far-famed palace of the Alhambra. These girls of the Mission School at Byculla won the silver medal for embroidery at the Calcutta exhibition last year.

Plain sewing is first taught in most of the mission schools, and in this line also the girls soon become proficient. The sewing machine they regard with great interest and awe, and are exceedingly proud when they are allowed to use one, and are especially happy if the garment to be made is one for their own wear.

Plain cooking on hygienic principles, and as nearly as possible in the American way, is usually in the curriculum. The instruction begins with the proper way of building and lighting the fire. As most of the fires in India are built directly on the ground the teachers have to vary their methods to a certain extent to comply with the necessities of the case. The dishes made are simple, but a number of them contain the ever-popular curry of which the East Indian is so fond. Onions and potatoes, the latter with the skins on, are cut up for curry. These girls are in many instances "famine orphans," whose parents and relatives perished in some one of the great famines that have swept over some of India's fairest provinces in recent years.

The boys are as interested as the girls in improving themselves and in learning some useful occupation. They wash their own clothes and any of the school pieces in order to earn a little money toward their support. If any one characteristic strikes the visitor more than another, it is the universal cheerfulness that seems to pervade the whole being of these young workers.

The youngsters carry out all the processes of the best equipped laundry, and the baskets are rapidly filled with neatly-ironed suits of duck and linen. Some of the school laundries receive a small grant from the British government enabling a number of the boys to earn the entire amount necessary for their education. Carpentry and metal work attract many of the young men, and there is an increasing demand for their work.

Among the Workers

—MISSIONARY J. M. L. HARROW has returned from Liberia on sick leave. He expects to go back to the field shortly.

—NOTABLE AMONG Sunday School workers is Miss Fannie Hogue, who has attended her class in the First Presbyterian Sunday School of Charleston, W. Va., every Sunday for thirty years, beginning November, 1877, and continuing to the present without a single break.

—THE WOMAN'S OCCIDENTAL BOARD OF FOREIGN MISSIONS, at a recent meeting in San Francisco, dedicated the newly built Presbyterian Mission Home, which takes the place of the one destroyed in the great fire of April, 1906. The home is a refuge for Chinese women and girls rescued from a condition of slavery.

—EVANGELIST MELVIN E. TROTTER, of Grand Rapids, Mich., and his brother George, on March 22 began a series of evangelistic meetings at Dreamland Rink, San Francisco, which proved to be one of the most successful campaigns for souls in that city in many years. Over two hundred confessed Christ. There were many notable conversions. On the closing night upwards of fifty people came forward and accepted Jesus, among these being seven soldiers from the Presidio.

—THE ANNUAL CONVENTION of the National Federation of Gospel Missions will be held in New York, May 14 to 17. Meetings will be held in Bedford Street M. E. Church and the Alliance Chapel, West Forty-fourth Street. Hon. John H. Woolley, of Chicago, the well-known temperance orator, will be the principal speaker. Short addresses will be made by mission superintendents in many States, reporting the progress of the work, a permanent organization will be effected and officers elected for the ensuing year.

CHICAGO'S SLAVIC MULTITUDES

THE WORK OF THE CHICAGO TRACT SOCIETY AMONG OUR FOREIGN POPULATION

THE Chicago Tract Society, which has just issued its eighteenth annual report, was organized by the Western officers and friends of the American Tract Society for the purpose of carrying on and extending Tract Society missionary work in Chicago and the Northwest. For nine years the society has been auxiliary to the parent organization in New York. In 1898 the Chicago Society was incorporated, and since that time it has been doing pioneer work, especially among the Slavic immigrants. During these ten years the work has been growing rapidly, and it has increased in volume about tenfold.

Missionaries, speaking in the aggregate twenty-three languages, have been in the employ of the Chicago Tract Society during the past year. The work is strictly un-denominational. Missionaries of all denominations have been aided with donations and over 2,100,000 pages of Christian literature have been used for this purpose through several hundred Christian workers.

The regularly employed missionaries of the society visited over 81,000 homes during 1907 and circulated Bibles, Testaments and Christian literature in thirty-three languages to the extent of over 40,500 volumes. During the past year nine denominations have been represented among the officers and seven among the missionaries in the field, yet there has been perfect harmony and every worker has been helping to magnify the Saviour and to honor the Gospel message. Dr. Jesse W. Brooks, the secretary, at the recent anniversary at Chicago said: "It would be little less than a calamity to-day if these workers should be divided and each should be called upon to go out and emphasize the denominational features of the church with which he may chance to be connected. We can conceive of no sadder sight than the vision of a half dozen competing denominations each striving to emphasize the superiority of its claims or of its denominational standards in a work which attempts to reach and win the foreign-speaking population of this great city and country."

He believes too that this work is going to the very root of the greatest problem with which our American civilization has to deal and urges that nowhere in the great world-field is there larger need of Christian service than among these exceptional classes who are crowded together in the foreign districts of our great cities. He says that while the work is essentially foreign mission work, it is supported at a quarter the expense that would be incurred if it had to be done in foreign lands.

In 1907 new departments of work were organized for the Finlanders, the Greeks, the Ruthenians and the Bulgarians. Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be interested to learn that the work among the Finlanders is in charge of Rev. Gustave Blomgren, who was for five years engaged in similar work in New York City. Mr. Blomgren, during the year, has not only cared for the spiritual needs of his countrymen who are resident in Chicago, but has been a missionary at large to the Finlanders in neighboring States. He has conducted services at least once each month at Whiting, Ind., at Milwaukee, Wis., and at Foster City and Metropolitan, Mich. One of the Swedish papers of Chicago was not far astray when it recently referred to Rev. Mr. Blomgren as having the largest parish of any minister in America. His programme for each month takes him to the principal points where his countrymen dwell in four of these great Central Western States. He reports regarding work at Foster City, in Dickinson County, Mich., where he has been preaching on one Sunday each month, that the Lord has done great things among the Finlanders there. "Sin has been swept away and men and women now love the word of God and have their prayer-meetings, praising the Lord and singing Gospel hymns." Great numbers of Finlanders have been settling in Northern Michigan, and infidel socialism seems to be their greatest foe. There is nothing but the vital power of the Gospel and the warm loving Christian message that can touch their hearts and lift up their lives.

Three Nationalities

Polish Father, Hungarian Mother, American Children

The work of the society among the Greeks is conducted by Rev. Christo T. Papadopoulos, who has been, until recently, for seventeen years a missionary under the American Board in the Turkish Empire. He makes a touching appeal in behalf of his countrymen, of whom over 46,000 were reported among last year's immigration, and for whose spiritual well-being very little has thus far been attempted. Mr. Papadopoulos writes: "Since arriving here I have been in prayer-meetings and have heard prayer for the Jews and prayer for the Italians, but in none have I ever heard any one pray for the Greeks. These Greeks are among the 'all nations' whom we are to go and teach. Paul says, 'we are debtors both to the Greeks and to the barbarians, both to the wise and to the unwise.' To-day the glory of Europe, and I dare say of America, depends on two words—Salamis and Marathon. Only the historian can tell what these two words cost the Greeks, and what they mean. The Greek nation, for whom no prayer is now offered, is prepared providentially for defense of all Europe from Mohammedanism, and God, by means of this nation, prepared the world for his blessed Gospel. Our university and seminary libraries are rich with Greek literature. Did God cast these Greeks away? Surely not, for in Christ Jesus there are no more Jews nor Greeks. Even if they have done nothing for us, at least for Christ's sake we are debtors to preach to them and to pray for them."

The great work of the Chicago Tract Society during these recent years has been among the Slavic people. Concerning the condition of these people in Chicago, Constantine Antoszewski, who is the senior Polish missionary of the society, has this to say:

"There are 40,000 Slavs here, 250,000 being Poles and 125,000 Bohemians. The others are Slovaks, Ruthenians, Slovenians, Croats, Russians, Bulgarians, Servians, etc. The Poles here have twenty Roman Catholic and a number of Independent Churches; some of them are the largest in the city. Just now they are building one which will cost $250,000. One of the churches has over 30,000 members. But the churches are surrounded with many saloons and the people do not hesitate to go from church straight to the saloon."

All the principal Slavic settlements in these Central Western States have been visited frequently by the missionaries, and in several of them the work has taken permanent form. Some of these centres where most has been done this year are Detroit, Saginaw, Bay City, Grand Rapids and Jackson, Michigan; Indianapolis and South Bend, Indiana; Milwaukee and Racine, Wisconsin; Cedar Rapids, Iowa; Hannibal, Ilasco and St. Joseph, Missouri; Kansas City, Leavenworth and Atchison, Kansas.

Mr. David Vernon, vice-president of the Commercial National Bank, Chicago, the treasurer, who has served the society solely as a labor of love almost ten years, makes a strong appeal now for larger support for this work, and also asks the friends of the society to provide a larger endowment fund in order to insure the future of the work. The society's headquarters are at 169 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

PLANNING A STRIKE

IN a Prussian roadside inn, one hot summer day, several men were smoking and drinking. The room was dirty and uncared for, and the men, who looked quite in keeping with it, were railing at the ways of Providence, and contrasting the luxury and idleness of the rich with the hardships of the poor.

During the conversation, a stranger, a young man, came in to eat his bread and cheese, while his team rested in the shade before the inn. For a time he listened silently and then joined in, saying:

"You must strike."

"Strike against what?" asked the peasants.

"Against poverty!" answered the young man, "and the weapon with which to strike is work."

"Well said! Sensibly spoken!" laughed the peasants.

"It would have been well for me had I always been as sensible," continued the stranger, "but I used to be an idle rogue. I was strong and healthy, but I would not work, and if now and then I was obliged to do anything, I was off at once to the alehouse, and like lightning the money was out and the brandy was in. I went from place to place. I soon had enough of farm service, and then I went about to fairs and public houses as a fiddler. Wherever any one would hear me, I scraped the violin; but with all my scraping I was never able to get a whole shirt to my back. Soon I grew tired of music, and then tried begging. I went up and down the country, but most doors were shut in my face. I grumbled that God had not made me a rich man, and I was envious of all who were better off than myself. I would have liked to turn the world upside down, that I might have been able to lord it over the rich. One day I went into an inn, sat down in a corner, and began muttering my begging speeches. At a table not far from me sat a gentleman—he is, as I afterward heard, a writer of books—he kept glancing at me, and I kept glancing at him, for I thought he would be sure to give me a good alms, and so he did. I'm spending it still."

"What was it?" asked the men.

"He came up to me and asked me about my early life. I told him I had been a farm servant, and sent from place to place—in short, I told him everything. He listened quietly, shook his head, and at last said, 'Show me your hands!' Astonished, I held out my hands; he examined them all over, pushing up my shirt sleeves, and again shook his head."

"What powerful hands! What strength there must be in those arms!" he said. "My lad, you must join in the war."

"In what war?" I asked.

"In a war against your misery!" he exclaimed in a loud voice. "You fool, you imagine you are poor—poor with such hands! What a mad idea! He only is poor who is sick in body or in mind. You are healthy in body and in mind. What! with such hands, poor! Set your wits to work and reflect upon the treasure God has given you in your strong, healthy limbs. Recover your senses and march forward in the war!"

"Bravo! That was good," laughed the peasants.

"And so I joined in the war," continued the young man. "I looked for a place, and now I am content and industrious."

Jesus and King Abgar

PUBLIC interest has been revived lately in one of the strangest of the apocryphal writings of the early Christian age. A cable dispatch from Paris announces that a French journal, L'Illustration, has obtained possession of a Greek parchment purporting to be a letter from Christ written to King Abgar, of Edessa. This parchment, it is stated, was discovered recently in Egypt by a French investigator, Abbe Jaffre. It is described as a document "rich in illuminations" illustrating the text. It recites a letter from the king appealing to the Saviour to cure his disease, and offering him an asylum from his persecutors in the royal city of Edessa. Then follows the text of what purports to be the reply of Jesus blessing the king and his city, but declining the offer of shelter, because he must fulfil his mission. He promised, however, to send his disciple Thaddeus, who would give healing and the Gospel to king and people.

This letter is by no means a new discovery, although it comes by the cable. Its existence was known as early as the third or fourth century, and Eusebius, in his writings, gives it in full. It was declared apocryphal by the authorities of the church in the fifth century, although it continued to find believers. There is not the slightest evidence that such an incident ever took place. Biblical scholarship in our own day has agreed on its rejection as spurious, and as belonging to an age when monkish ingenuity had well-nigh exhausted itself in devising imaginative stories concerning the Saviour and his earthly mission. These and all stories of a similar character were stamped as apocryphal by the leading churchmen of those early days. Since they pronounced the Abgarus letter spurious, it has never been seriously considered by church historians. The recent discovery in Egypt of an ancient copy of the letter in Greek may excite a passing interest among the curious; but it cannot change the verdict already pronounced by those best qualified to judge of the value and influence of early monkish fiction.

Statistics Made to Order

A READER of this journal in a Western State recently wrote to us enclosing a clipping from a Chicago newspaper. It was in the form of a brewing company's advertisement and was designed to catch votes for the saloon interest. This advertisement contained the following alleged statistics relative to "dry" and "wet" States, which were declared to have been compiled from the latest United States Census Report:

	Maine (Dry)	Kansas (Dry)	Illinois (Wet)
Number of saloons.....	0	0	9,116
Arrests for drunkenness, per 1,000 population.....	26	24	22
Number of prisoners per 100,000 population.....	70	193.3	60.8
Number of prisoners per 100,000 population committed to jail in 1904.....	254.6	144.9	80.5
Increase in value of all property for five years, ending 1905.....	14%	16%	26%
Decrease in rate of tax in twelve years.....	7%		10%
Average annual wage per wage earner.....	$427	$532	$548
Decrease in child labor in five years to 1905.....	32.4%	8.4%	50.2%

Then came the direct appeal of the saloon: "Do you want to adopt Prohibition (or local option) and have more drunkenness and crime, higher taxes and less wages? Vote No!"

As THE CHRISTIAN HERALD stated recently, the saloon and brewing forces, driven to desperation by the recent temperance victories, have not scrupled at mangling official statistics to make them appear to bear out their particular claims. Investigation proves that the present case is one of this mendacious character. In order to ascertain the exact facts THE CHRISTIAN HERALD wrote to the Director of the United States Census in Washington, submitting the advertisement containing the "statistics" in question. Acting Director T. R. Rossiter replied: "I take pleasure in enclosing to you herewith a reprint of a letter on the subject of your inquiries addressed by the Director of the Census" (to an inquirer in Virginia).

The statement enclosed, which is signed by S. D. North, Director of the Census, says: "The Census Office is not responsible for this publication; no Census official has made any statement of the nature contained in the article." He adds that the press, the Census Office and the public have been made the victims of an irresponsible writer, "who undoubtedly manufactured his statistics from tables 2 and 3 in the Census report on the statistics for cities for 1903—Census Bulletin 20. . . . The writer of the article in question combined the arrests for drunkenness with those for disorderly conduct, and thus falsified the figures."

Director North adds: "These computations were made with the apparent purpose of conveying a distinctly false impression. All such computations, based on these statistics, are valueless and misleading."

Director North's very frank and unhesitating repudiation of the manufactured statistics relieves the Census Bureau of all responsibility in the matter. It lays at the door of the brewers and saloonkeepers the blame for this transparent fraud which has been so easily punctured. Of course such manufactured evidence can only recoil against the cause it is designed to support.

The Slaughter of the Birds

WITH what delight we watch for the first robin, and how happy we are when we hear his cheery note and catch the first flash of his crimson breast! In many Northern localities it has been noted with regret that there are fewer robins than of old, and robin-lovers have been troubled to account for the fact. In the South, from Virginia to Florida, the robin is accounted a table delicacy, and is killed by hundreds and thousands during the winter months. Small boys get fifty and sixty cents a dozen at the hotels for dead robins; negroes shoot them as they lodge in the cedar bushes, and while mocking-birds are protected by law, no legal shield saves the little robin from its cruel fate. To those who love the robin for its song, and who know what a friendly neighbor it is around Northern homes, it seems like vandalism that robins should be slaughtered for food.

The slaughter of birds unnecessarily, either for the table or for decorative purposes, is a crime against nature, and nature will surely exact reprisals in the day of her harvesting. Why should not bird-lovers everywhere, both North and South, take steps at once to protect the birds from wanton destruction? Unless something is done speedily, a great joy will disappear from our common life.

Newspapers in every part of the land should call attention to this wrong. Many an evil would be corrected if only public attention were focused upon it. The song-birds cannot save themselves.

A Historic Church

IN 1808, when New York had a population of 75,000, the territory north of Canal Street and west of Broadway was vacant ground known as "Greenwich Village." In that section of the young metropolis the Methodists began to preach the religion of Jesus, "the carpenter's Son," in a carpenter's shop. From this humble beginning there soon grew a large and flourishing church, inspiring and evangelizing a great part of the northern section of the city. Among the pastors of Bedford Street Church, who were the foremost men of the old-time Methodism of the early days, were many who afterwards became famous. Here John P. Newman (afterwards Bishop Newman, and the personal friend of President Grant) commenced his metropolitan career. Here John E. Cookman served two two-year terms and proved himself a flaming evangelist. He was followed by men known far and wide throughout the land—among whom were G. H. Gregory, W. McK. Darwood, James S. Chadwick and John J. Reed, while among the list of converts in this hive of spiritual activity we find such well-known names as Edward Sketchley, identified with the beginning of rescue mission work, and Stephen Merritt, whose preaching has been the means of leading thousands to the Saviour, among them the proprietor and editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Louis Klopsch.

Old Bedford Street Church this year celebrates its rounded centenary of Gospel service. Its newly appointed pastor, the Rev. William Potts George, D.D., LL.D. (who is already known to many of our readers, and whose inaugural sermon we printed in last week's issue), announces as the keynote of his ministry, "Jesus Christ and him crucified." God's people everywhere will unite with us in wishing for the grand old church a still broader field of Gospel activity and steadily enlarging opportunities for spiritual work in the years to come.

The Question of Quality

TO close observers of present day life there are two characteristics which stand out prominently. First, the almost universal desire to do things quickly, if possible at greater speed than ever before; second, to do things in a big way. Quality, which should be the first importance, seems to take third place, if it is remembered at all.

A prominent American educator, in speaking of the rapid rush to settle our unoccupied territory in the great West, which was the most noteworthy characteristic of our national life for three-quarters of a century, said recently that, now that that stupendous task has been practically completed, we were now going over the ground to see if we had done it well. We have demanded greater bridges, faster engines, larger steamers. The Lusitania of over seven hundred feet in length is now not big enough, and one is building that will be a thousand feet from stem to stern. All these things strike the popular imagination and doubtless stir laudable ambition, but is not this ambition for speed and size only? This would be a matter for congratulation if the imitators were also stirred with the ambition to make whatever they produced the best of its kind.

In our character building we too often forget the insistence that should be placed on quality. The brilliant and showy in man's mental make-up are often but mistakenly placed at a higher value than sound judgment, experience, and accurate thinking. The man of business who gets rich slowly but honestly seems not to be so much admired as he who becomes wealthy in a day, yet the latter may be but a creature of chance and good fortune, and what came in a few hours may go in less.

The finest things of past ages, the great temples, the majestic cathedrals, all great works of art, of literature, and of nation-building have been done by men who sought quality and worked as fast as good results would permit, and no faster. They doubtless had worshipers of size and speed in their day, but we of the present know not who they were.

We need above all else a little more attention to the test mark on our work and in our lives than to those marked "time" and "size."

Missionary Mention

PASTOR W. FETLER, of St. Petersburg, writes calling "for a united and universal week of prayer for poor and needy Russia," for the revival of all Christians, the conversion of the masses and the work among the young.

MISS MARY ELY, missionary of the American Board at Bitlis, Asia Minor, writes that the suffering in that section continues. At Diarbekir, a large number of persons from the northern provinces have come to beg. There will be an increase of suffering until the harvest.

THE TWENTY-FIFTH annual gathering of missionaries of all evangelical missionary societies, from all lands, will convene at Clifton Springs, N. Y., June 3-10. The object of this union is to enable those in attendance to get acquainted with persons, fields, methods, helps and hindrances in mission work, and to promote missionary sympathy, prayer and fellowship.

The British Warship "Gladiator," Damaged in Collision

The American Liner "St. Paul"

Collision at Sea

LOSS of life, the sinking of one ship and injuries to another, were the sad tidings cabled from the English shores on April 25. The St. Paul, of the American line, sailing from Southampton for New York, was proceeding toward the open sea through the narrow channel between the mainland and the Isle of Wight, when it had to slow down owing to fog and a blinding snowstorm. The pilot was still in charge and lookout men were placed forward, when the hull of the British cruiser Gladiator was seen scarcely a ship's length ahead. Everything possible was done to avert the disaster, but it was too late. Though both vessels were proceeding at a slow rate, the stem of the St. Paul struck the cruiser straight amidships, where it was unprotected by armor, and cut her almost in two. The cruiser heeled over immediately, showing that she had been injured below the water line, and many of her crew of 450 men fell into the sea. The American liner's watertight compartments were speedily closed, and having thus protected herself, efforts were made to save the men from the sinking cruiser.

They were evidently under excellent discipline. Some of their boats had been smashed by the collision, and the vessel was rapidly going down, but they were drawn up in line on the slanting deck as if on parade and were being told off in companies to the remaining boats and to those which the St. Paul was lowering. So cool were they that, standing on deck waiting their turn to enter the boats, they sang "Rule Britannia." They were all on board the boats before the captain left the ship. Some of the men who had been injured when the impact came, and others who had fallen into the water, were lost. It is believed that in all thirty-six men perished, none of whom belonged to the St. Paul. One of the dead was a steward who actually reached the shore in safety, but, remembering that he had left his savings, amounting to $200, on board the cruiser, he swam back again and recovered the money, but lost his life in swimming back to the shore, and his dead body was flung up on the beach.

The Gladiator sank in shallow water twenty minutes after the collision, and the St. Paul returned to Southampton for repairs. Her stem was completely carried away and her plates twenty feet back were crushed in. Her passengers and mails were sent on by a White Star liner. It is satisfactory to learn that the coroner's jury empaneled to inquire into the death of the Gladiator's men acquitted the American liner of blame for the disaster, declaring it to be the result of an accident to which all seamen are liable. Like the chariots described by the prophet, the swift progress of these mighty vessels is sometimes destructive to one another.

They jostle one against another in the broad ways; the appearance of them is like torches, they run like lightnings. (Nahum 2:4, R. V.)

More Wireless Wonders

A cablegram from London says that Hans Knudsen, the Danish inventor, announces his discovery of a method of setting type at a distance by wireless waves of electricity. He promises to publicly demonstrate his invention within a few weeks. By a machine now in course of construction, he says, he will be able to set type at a distance just as readily as if the operator were seated at the machine. He declares that the time is not far distant when the newspaper correspondent in Europe will be able to set his articles for the American press in type here instead of writing them or cabling them over. As a reproof to his incredulous hearers, he transmitted a portrait from one room to another, through a brick wall without wires. In the first room a transmitter with a needle point passed over a picture, and in the adjoining room, unconnected by wire and separated by a wall, a succession of electric waves accurately reproduced the picture on a smoked glass plate. "I claim I can send pictures wherever Marconi can send messages," said Mr. Knudsen. "Within a short time I shall be sending pictures of criminals and finger-prints from England to New York." It would appear that the time is coming when the work of the world will be largely done by the forces surrounding us, of the existence of which men have been ignorant all the ages, and an affirmative answer be given to the challenge to the patriarch:

Canst thou send lightnings that they may go, and say unto thee, Here we are? (Job 38 : 35.)

A Hospital 2,200 Years Old

An American lady wintering in Rome, according to a European correspondent of the Sun, made an interesting discovery recently. One of her servants was suffering from an ulcerated tooth, and pitying the girl yet shrinking from paying the high charges of Italian dentists, she cast about for some place where free treatment was given. She was directed to the Island of the Tiber, where there was a hospital. She sent the girl there, and she was successfully treated by a monk-dentist named Fra Arsenico. Mentioning the circumstance to a Roman scholar she learned that the hospital on the island had a romantic history. About 300 B.C., tradition says, a pestilence raged through the region, and a deputation was sent to Epidaurus to obtain the help of Æsculapius, the tutelary deity of that place. The ambassadors returned with a sacred snake, the emblem of the god, which escaped as their boat passed up the Tiber, and took refuge on the island. Thereupon the augurs concluded that a temple to Æsculapius should be built there. This was done, and the temple was called Asklepieia, which became a sanctuary for the afflicted. The poor people resorted thither, and according to popular belief many miracles were wrought. The temple was destroyed about 468 A.D., but a church and convent were built on its site, and as the sick still resorted thither attracted by its record of miracles, a hospital was erected that now bears the name of St. Bartolommeo. A number of monks devoted to medicine still keep up the traditions that have been associated with the island for twenty-two centuries. How much better are such traditions than those that cling around the famous battlefields! How much nearer it is to the character of that place that John saw.

And the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations. (Rev. 22 : 2.)

Dies of a Rare Disease

The case of a young man who died recently at Glen Cove, N. Y., is causing some interest among physicians. The young man was away from home on a visit when he was taken ill, and his condition became so alarming that his father was hurriedly summoned, and removed him to his home. He was restless during the night, but toward morning fell into a deep sleep from which, though physicians were called in, he could not be aroused, and finally died. The physicians, after a careful study of the symptoms, came to the conclusion that it was a case of the "sleeping sickness," which has wrought widespread havoc in Africa. Only one or two other cases of this have been recorded in this country, but it has been made familiar to medical men through the researches of Dr. Koch. The illness is caused by a parasite called "trypanosome," which is disseminated by a fly, to which naturalists have given the name "Glossina palpalis." The one prominent case known in this country was reported from New Orleans, whither the fly had probably been brought from Africa in the hold of a ship. Dr. Koch has been to Africa to study the disease, and has succeeded in obtaining an arsenical preparation as an antidote, which he calls "atoxyle," which has cured practically every case of the disease on which it has been tried in the earlier stages. It will surely be used in every future case that may develop, for it is the only remedy that has proved efficacious. We can but wish that in the still more deadly malady of sin, which has the same effect of producing the fatal sleep of the soul, the sovereign remedy that Christ has revealed might always be applied.

Wherefore he saith, Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light. (Eph. 5 : 14.)

An Unknown Noble

A plain American business man is expecting the arrival from Europe by the next steamer of his daughter and her husband, who have been visiting the latter's family. It is quite a romantic visit, for the young man courted and married the girl as plain Noel De Vaux. He was working some years ago as a draughtsman for a bridge-builder and lived at Hackensack, N. J. He was a studious man, and was able after a time to pass his examinations and take rank as a civil engineer. He made the acquaintance of the Hackensack girl and won her affection. He had worked for her father, who is a contractor, and his skill and industry commended him to his employer. His suit, therefore, was favorably received when he proposed for the young lady's hand. They were married, and were living quietly and prospering, when a visitor arrived from France. Mr. De Vaux received him hospitably, but what was his wife's surprise when she heard the visitor refer to her husband as "the Baron"! Then the secret was told. Mr. De Vaux admitted that he was the great-grandson of the Marquis De Vergennes, and was known in France as the Viscount De Vaux. He stated simply that he had concealed his rank, preferring to make his own way here rather than lead a life of frivolous idleness in Europe. The surprise of his wife and his business associates may be imagined. There will be an infinitely greater surprise in that day which is surely coming, when humble men little thought of now are recognized as the children of God and heirs of heaven.

Hath not God chosen the poor of this world, rich in faith and heirs of the kingdom which he hath promised to them that love him? (James 2 : 5.)

THE GOSPEL AVERTS A TRAGEDY

A WOULD-BE MURDERER AND SUICIDE CONVERTED AT A REVIVAL IN NORFOLK, VA

ALTHOUGH the Chapman-Alexander meetings have been in progress in Norfolk, Va., only a few nights, the city is already aroused by the movement. A sensational incident occurred at the first meeting. About three thousand people had gathered in the big armory to hear the evangelists. After a stirring song service, led by Mr. Alexander and his choir of four hundred voices, Dr. Chapman announced that all day long a text had been ringing through his mind. He had wished to take another, but had been strongly led to the one in John 6: 68: "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life."

It happened that there was a man in the audience at that very moment who was planning to commit a double crime. The Gospel message pierced his heart, and instead of doing the deed he intended, he gave his heart to God. The next day Dr. Chapman gave the representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this account of the incident:

"The first morning we were in Norfolk, a well-dressed young man met me in the hotel and said: 'May I speak to you a moment?' When I said: 'Yes, sir,' he said: 'I must see you alone.' Taking him over into a secluded corner he burst into tears and said: 'I heard you preach last night and you have saved me from an awful crime, and I want to give you something.' He said that he and his young wife were not residents of Norfolk, but were strangers in the city. They had been disappointed in finances and had been reduced to the last penny. Their unpaid hotel bill was staring them in the face. 'I am a graduate of a school of technology,' he said, 'and also of music, but I have been able to find nothing. We are on the verge of starvation and I had become so depressed that I had made up my mind last night to kill my wife and then to end my own life. But my wife asked me to go to your service and I went, thinking only that it would occupy my time. Your text went through me like a knife. I saw my sin and myself. I cried all the night, and I hope that I have given myself to God. At least I know that I am not a murderer, and now will you take this?' and he drew from his pocket the revolver which would have ended the lives of the two. Bursting into tears he said: 'Pray for me! Do pray for me! God helping me, from to-day I shall lead a Christian life.' Since talking with him I have every reason to believe that his conversion is genuine. Such is the power of a single verse of God's Word."

Every indication gives promise of sweeping spiritual victory in Norfolk. Other evangelists assisting Chapman and Alexander, and holding meetings in other districts of the city simultaneously, include Dr. Daniel S. Toy and Frank Dixon, Dr. Frank Granstaff and O. F. Pugh, Dr. Ora S. Gray and C. F. Allen, and Charles H. Marsh. Miss Bertha Irene Chapman, the evangelist's daughter, and E. W. Naftsgar are the soloists with Chapman and Alexander, and accompanist Robe Harkness.

Dr. Gordon ("Ralph Connor") and Evangelist Alexander

After leaving Philadelphia, Dr. Chapman and M. Alexander spent two days in New York. On Monday evening Mr. Alexander led the singing at the Laymen Missionary Meeting at Carnegie Hall. On the following day, Dr. Chapman, with Mr. Alexander and Dr. Charles W. Gordon, were the guests of honor at luncheon given by the committee in charge of the summer tent work in New York. Nearly or quite one hundred clergymen or business men were in attendance. Dr. Gordon, better known as "Ralph Connor," the author of The Sky Pilot, etc., aroused great enthusiasm by telling of his experiences as an evangelist during the Philadelphia campaign. He said he had gone to the city with a pile of "beautiful sermons," but he threw them aside, gave simple talks on how to find Christ and had glorious success.

Dr. Chapman made an address on present-day evangelism. He related the following story: "While the Philadelphia campaign was in progress, a distinguished looking man came to me, to invite me with Mr. Alexander to lunch with him. The invitation was declined, only to be renewed the next day, and accepted. We learned that our host was one of the important men in Pennsylvania, politically, financially and socially. He told us he had taken a decided stand for Christ, and was so emphatic about it that I asked him to give his testimony in public. But he said: 'I cannot do this for the present, because I have been living a hypocritical life and people know it; and I must go about and build up some of the fences which I have torn down.' He went away and was gone almost an entire week. He journeyed through the State, asking forgiveness of men against whom he had sinned, and then came back and said he was ready now to speak."

A great meeting was held in the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, to inaugurate the summer tent work in that city. Over 5,000 people were present. While all were singing "Rescue the Perishing," Mr. Alexander saw the author of the song, Dr. Doane, sitting in one of the boxes. Calling upon him to stand up, Dr. Doane reluctantly consented, and the people broke into hearty applause. Dr. Chapman and Dr. Gordon delivered powerful addresses on the transforming force of the Gospel. GEORGE T. B. DAVIS.

WELCOMED AT THE BOWERY MISSION

AT one of "Mother" Bird's recent meetings at the Bowery Mission a great pleasure was afforded the men by the unexpected entrance of Mr. George S. Stebbins, the eminent Gospel song writer, with his brother-in-law, Rev. John Currie of Montreal. Mr. Currie is the Superintendent of the American Mission Chapel on Inspector Street, in that city. No sooner had these two gentlemen taken seats on the platform than they were pressed into service.

The Bowery Mission is famous for its congregational singing, and singing evangelists like Mr. Sankey and Mr. Alexander have been deeply impressed with the tremendous volume of sound that these five hundred Bowery men can produce, as well as by the facility with which they learn any new hymn introduced. They are never happier than when they are singing some of Mr. Stebbins' exquisite productions, such as "Saved by Grace," "Jesus is Calling," "Come Unto Me, Ye Weary." It was therefore a great delight to them to meet face to face the man "whom having not seen" they had come to reverence because of the joy his songs had brought into their lives. Mr. Stebbins, however, after a few earnest, tender words, and the singing of the solo, "The Bird with the Broken Pinion," introduced his brother-in-law, and for the rest of the meeting kept in the background.

Mr. Currie is a keen-eyed, ready-witted, Bible-reading, soul-loving Scotchman. At Mr. Stebbins' request, he sang with great tenderness and power, "My Ain Countrie." The soul-moving influence of the quaint Scotch dialect brought tears to the eyes of many of his fellow countrymen who were present. Away down in the audience could be seen poor sin-stricken prodigals who were "far frae their hame," men who, like the singer, had had a Godly training in their youth, but had broken away from all restraints, and were now suffering and heart-broken outcasts in the Bowery. They listened as men seldom listen to a Gospel message, and when the singer came to the words,

My sins hae been mony, an' my sorrows hae been sair;
But there they'll never vex me, nor be remembered mair;
For his blude hath made me white, an' his haun' shall dry my ee,
When he brings me hame at last, to my ain countrie.

they were deeply affected, and when the song and the spoken message were concluded, many of them stayed in the after-meeting, and were gathered into the fold of the same Shepherd-Saviour who, thirty years ago, saved John Currie.

Mr. Currie gave a most interesting account of his early training, his subsequent prodigal life, his rescue in Montreal, his conversion, and his subsequent work in the Inspector Street Mission. Over and over again, in recounting happenings there, he was corroborated by men who had lived in the city of Montreal, especially by one old Irish sailor who had been a frequent habitue of "Joe Beef's Canteen," in which place Mr. Currie conducted religious services at one time for sixteen consecutive months. J. Thinks the Calendar is a Gem

Dear Dr. Klopsch: Your beautiful Calendar received. Many thanks for it, and also for the good wishes that accompanied it. I have no hesitation in saying that it is by far the most beautiful calendar that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has given its readers within the last five years at least, and that is saying a great deal. New Haven, Conn. A Home for the Nation's Consumptives

W. R. Eidson, Founder

Main Building of the Fraternal City Sanatorium

A Patient

NO Sick." In these two words lies the story of one of the most tragic sides of the "Great White Scourge" that claims one victim in death in this country every three minutes. "No Sick"—meaning, literally, "No Consumptives Wanted Here."

I saw that sign hanging in front of many boarding-houses in Los Angeles, El Paso, and other towns of the Southwest. I saw those words at the end of many newspaper advertisements for boarders. At the same time the State of Texas put itself on public record as opposed to "harboring" consumptives. In Los Angeles I saw hundreds of consumptives eating in cellar restaurants. They ate in those dark places because food was cheaper there than above ground, and because in the more desirable eating-places the man with the mark of tuberculosis upon his countenance was given to understand, in one way or another, that his patronage was not desired.

Here, then, was the anomaly of health-seekers in the land of sunshine going three times a day to underground dining-rooms for their meals. Here was one of the visible results of that sign, "No Sick."

It was the same in regard to rooms. Light, sunny, cheerful rooms were reserved for red-cheeked tourists. For the white-faced victim of the Great White Plague there was left only the dark inside rooms in the cheaper rooming-houses. In these cheerless rooms I found them living under unsanitary conditions, without any medical attention, their sole hope lying in the salubrious effect of the climate. What I saw in Los Angeles and El Paso, I saw in other towns in the Southwest.

It may be added that consumptives to-day find themselves barred even from the low-rate hotels in the Southwest. Time was when all hotels in that region of our country were glad to receive as guests persons suffering from the scourge of consumption. Now, however, both population and travel have wonderfully increased, and hotels are taxed to care for the healthy transients. Hence, no matter what inducements the patients may offer, the hotels do not want them, the regular guests are afraid of them, and the poor invalids are now forbidden, or simply taken as a great accommodation.

Yet the knowledge among physicians generally of the ideal conditions prevailing in New Mexico has resulted in thousands of sufferers being sent to that Territory, and, in consequence, every town and settlement has its share of afflicted ones. But where are they to lay their heads, where to eat, where to be cared for, where to find a home? These are the questions I asked myself when, day after day, I saw scores of sufferers sitting in the park at El Paso, all looking so hopeless, all shunned by the healthy.

It is estimated that eight million persons—one in every ten of our population—suffer from tuberculosis in this country. An average of 450 perish every day. One person dies of consumption every three minutes, a total of 175,000 a year. Tens of thousands of these poor sufferers flock to the Southwest—New Mexico, Arizona, Southern California—because there they find a minimum of dampness and a maximum of dryness and sunshine in a climate in which they can live the year round outdoors. The victim of tuberculosis goes to the Southwest, in short, knowing that there is the climate that will not only prolong his life, but probably cure him.

By GILSON WILLETS

"But climate is not all," I said to doctors in Los Angeles and in El Paso and elsewhere. "It is evident that what these sufferers need, in addition to dryness, sunshine and altitude, is a home. They need sanatorium life where each case will have medical attention, where the daily life of a patient is under control. Is there not even one thoroughly equipped yet low-priced home in all the Southwest?" I asked.

"Yes! It stands between the two government sanatoria in New Mexico, between the sanatorium at Fort Moody was for twenty-five years manager of the American Baptist Publication Society. Three years ago he forsook all other interests to give his undivided attention to the management of the Fraternal City Sanatorium. He has worked all three years without salary—for God and humanity.

Our drive out to the sanatorium, along the foothills of the Sacramento Mountains, was simply delightful. It was a drive of five miles, always upward—the sanatorium being 400 feet above the town and about 5,000 feet above sea level. As I alighted from the buggy at the front door, I looked out upon a magnificent panorama 150 miles long and 70 miles wide.

Henceforth, for six weeks, I was to live amid these grand aspects of nature with thirty or more sufferers from consumption—men and women who had come there for their health—and who, as I learned, were regaining health quicker even than they had hoped.

Conceive of two large buildings set down in the ideal surroundings I have suggested, constructed on the latest models for habitations for victims of the great scourge; imagine a weary, despondent patient arriving at this institution and being shown into a room all light and sunshine; think of the peace and cheer that come to him when he surrenders himself to a kind doctor and a trained nurse, who is a veritable "little mother" to him! Thinking of these things, you can appreciate the remark made by a newcomer while I was there. When that newcomer arrived, after having been buffeted about the Southwest for months, with no one around him caring whether he lived or died, with the sign "No Sick" confronting him everywhere, with people shunning him openly, as people in the Orient shun the "unclean" leper—he was now put to bed and told to rest for twenty-four hours. Every few hours during that time the nurse brought him two raw eggs in a crystal tumbler. His regular meals were brought to his bedside. Dr. Miller gave many orders concerning his care. The nurse entered his "condition" in a book, and in the evening Mr. Moody brought a Bible and, sitting by the patient's bedside, read him the Word. As the chapter was finished, the patient, with tears coursing down his white cheeks, exclaimed: "This is heaven!"

That is the experience of all the patients arriving at Alamo Gordo. They find not only a sanatorium but a home. They are far from loved ones, yet homesickness drops from their soul as the overcoat which they no longer need drops from their back. They were racked mentally about making ends meet in their former necessary expenses; but here everything is supplied for $7.50 a week—a room or tent-house with connecting toilet, a comfortable, clean bed, a doctor at hand always, a trained nurse administering to all wants, a dozen fresh eggs daily and three homelike meals in a lofty, sunny dining hall.

Eleven States were represented among the thirty patients I met while there. There are accommodations

Bayard and that at Fort Stanton. It is the the Fraternal City Sanatorium at Alamo Gordo, New Mexico. There is a place run on humanitarian lines where the patient of small means can live under doctors and trained nurses as low as $1.07 a day, or about one-third the cost of living either in boarding-houses or in other sanatoria in the Southwest."

I resolved to go up to Alamo Gordo, visit the Fraternal City Sanatorium and stay there long enough to see for myself exactly how it was run and what progress toward health the patients made there. This was in December last. I had been interested in the great scourge for five years and had myself lived at different sanatoria in the Southwest; but always I found that among the patients of small means it was a question of cost. I found that at the expensive sanatoria, poor patients would remain till their money gave out and then go back home only to die.

The train took me direct to Alamo Gordo, a pretty, progressive town of 4,000 inhabitants, with a park bigger than the biggest in El Paso and with churches of many denominations. At the station I was met by Melville P. Moody, the general manager of the sanatorium. Mr.

IN THE BUDDING SPRINGTIME

Love Never Grows Old

By Margaret E. Sangster

Telephone Manners

TWO dear old people recently left their home and went on an outing to a popular resort by the sea. They must have passed the milestone of the golden wedding by several years, but both were still young enough in heart to enjoy their bit of a holiday with fully as much zest as the youngest bride and groom sitting in the drawing-room after dinner, or loitering on a pier above the sweep of the great foam-capped breakers. The old wife called the old husband darling, and was solicitous for his comfort at the table, and careful that he was seated in an angle of the porch where the rough winds would not blow upon him. The old husband looked at the old wife with the eyes of a lover, and sometimes glanced around when she had said something clever or witty, to see if others had caught the sparkle of her bright and merry talk. There were those who followed every step of some newly wedded pair, with the peculiar tenderness that is associated with love's young dream, but others thought of the romance that had held fast its sweetness through many changeable years, and of the fidelity that had bound two hearts together from life's clear morning to its sunset slope, and for the old lovers they felt greater sympathy and the fuller enthusiasm.

No wonder two old friends and comrades who have fared along the same life path through life's succeeding seasons, bearing and sharing the burdens and the joys, halving every load and tasting the sweetness of every cup, grow in time into a certain resemblance, so that bystanders say smilingly that they might be brother and sister. When the hour comes that these friends must part, the one who stays behind may have the comfort of knowing that the separation cannot be long. The loneliness will be as complete as any that can fall to the lot of youthful companions who are separated by death. In very truth love never grows old, and the child-heart still beats in many a venerable breast.

We need to repeat this with emphasis in days when, were we to judge by the reports in the newspapers, divorces are as plentiful as once they were singular, yet there are whole towns and villages inhabited by orderly, well-meaning folk in which a report of marital unhappiness or the rumor of a divorce would to-day produce a sensation akin to an earthquake. The bulk of our people are faithful to their marriage vows, and look upon the pledges made at the altar as sacredly binding them one to the other until earthly life shall end. The country could not flourish as it does were there any real menace to the stability of the family. The strength of a chain is in its every link. The safety of an edifice depends upon its corner-stone. Because Americans revere the home and the hearth-stone, because parents and children as a rule live in mutual trust and affection, and because unselfishness is much more common than its opposite, our nation still presents an unstained front to the world, and continues to grow in the world's respect and confidence. The young girl may smile when the old wife calls the old husband "darling," but in the far end of the day the youth at her side may hear the same gentle word from her own loving lips.

Girlish Prowess

Three young girls, belles of a Southern city, were recently visiting a relative in a village where there was no organized fire department. The house took fire and for an hour or more the girls fought the flames as intrepidly and successfully as men could have done, passing buckets of water to one another and breaking down portions of the wood-work so that the progress of the fire was stopped. In the Revolutionary days girls were quick with devices to aid their brothers, by melting lead for bullets, as well as preparing lint for bandages. The courage of the modern girl quite equals that of her great-grandmother. In an emergency she may be trusted to see the right thing and to know how to do it. One advantage our girls have in these days is that their athletic training stands them in stead when there is need for the quick eye, the ready hand and the elastic muscle. A girl who can play basketball or row a boat, who has taken lessons in first aid to the wounded, and paid attention to physical culture will never run away from danger if there is any probability of success in fighting it.

Girlish prowess was shown in another way by a trio of Pennsylvania girls who were treed one spring day by an angry bull. They were crossing a pasture and they were dressed in finery befitting the season of blos-

THE telephone has become almost a necessity every house that is possessed of ordinary conveniences. One finds it in homes great and small, in the farm house, the suburban cottage and the ample mansion. By its means the luxuries of the market are brought at short notice to homes remote from railway centres, and friends at a distance from one another have the pleasure of hearing the living voice and of quick communication. There ought to be a code of telephone manners. In the first place, the young woman at the other end whom we call "Central" is not a machine, but a personality. We would not think of being rude to her if she and we were in the same room, yet we often permit ourselves to show irritation by brusqueness bordering on abuse when "Central" does not do our bidding or give us the parties of whom we are in search as promptly as we anticipate. "Central" has her own difficulties with which to contend. She is a young girl honestly earning her livelihood, and entitled to as much consideration as if she were our sister or daughter. A cardinal point in telephone good manners is to be courteous to "Central."

In the next place, if we have what is called a party wire, we share it with a number of others who have as much right to its use as we have ourselves. Strictly followed, the rules of the company allow each customer time to talk from three to five minutes. In rural neighborhoods some license is given for longer conversation than can be compressed within this limit. It is extremely thoughtless in people sharing a party wire to use it for lengthy gossiping conversations with friends at any time of day, and it is especially unpardonable to do this in the rush hours of the morning when everybody wants to give orders to grocer and butcher, and when the man of the house is hurrying away to his train.

We have been asked whose part it is to close a conversation on the telephone. Good manners require over the telephone precisely the same etiquette governing well-bred men and women everywhere else, and, therefore, the one who begins a conversation should be the one to close it with a final good-morning or good-by. Professional men have exclusive wires, yet even to one's physician whose wire is his own, one who speaks over a party wire should be guarded as to confidences. It goes without saying, of course, that no honorable person ever takes advantage of opportunity to listen to what is not intended for his or her ear, yet there are those whose curiosity or ill-breeding makes them forgetful of the rules of honor.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—COUNTRY MAID. The city cousins are wearing large hats with flaring brims and quantities of flowers and feathers this season.

—L. B. A little manual of hand sewing issued by the Wilson Industrial School of New York will give you the information you need.

—NURSERY DISCIPLINE. If a child is wilfully naughty and in need of punishment, the fact that she is motherless has little to do with the situation. I am not in favor of whipping as a punishment for little children, except as a last resort. In most cases it would be as effective to undress the child and put it to bed in the daytime, depriving it of dessert or of some indulgence, as to resort to spanking. The latter course is a little easier for a grown person, and is sometimes the best remedy for childish obstinacy. A switch is a better instrument than a slipper, if a child must be punished by this method. I advise my correspondent to buy a copy of Gentle Measures in the Training of the Young, by Jacob Abbott, a book worth its weight in gold. It is published by Harper & Brothers, New York.

MAYTIME IN THE GARDEN

IN the garden 'mid the flowers, soms and birds. The bull, monarch of a herd, happened to catch the gleam of a scarlet ribbon and was straightway infuriated and rushed headlong at the young women, whose athletic training had taught them how to climb. They were imprisoned in the branches of a tree at a height that made them safe from the bull, who pawed the ground at its foot, and though a hail storm, with lightning and thunder, fell upon them with hurtling force, they were thankful for the tree's asylum in mid-air. They, too, showed girlish prowess, discretion being valor in their case.

A Needless Sacrifice

Those who love horses (and who does not?) must be grieved to learn that Mr. Cody, better known as Buffalo Bill, felt obliged to kill all his magnificent horses, to satisfy a popular prejudice among the peasantry in France. An epidemic had broken out among these poor horses, but they had recovered and were out of danger. Amid the useless bloodshed of the world may be enumerated this slaughter of dumb creatures that had willingly served their owner, and given pleasure to thousands of the public.

A COURSE IN ESPERANTO

LESSON No. 10.—By Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

Esperanto and the Red Cross

At first mention of the matter one must see the desirability of Esperanto being adopted as the language of the Red Cross in all lands. It would insure more rapid relief work, because all orders would be understood at once. It is said to be necessary often to hold back things to be done until an interpreter can be found. In this way the noble labors of the Red Cross often lose much of their value. Dr. Zamenhof, the aŭtoro of Esperanto, is profoundly interested in this matter, and wishes la plej bonan sukceson to those who are trying to have Esperanto thus used. Miss Clara Barton, who has large influence in Red Cross matters in all the world, is greatly in favor of it, and the Secretary of the American Red Cross gives it his approval.

A Red Cross Manual in French and Esperanto has been prepared by Lieutenant Bayol, of the Military School of Saint Cyr. Extracts from it will be given in this lesson, translating the French into Esperanto and English.

Cruising Under the Equator

a professor of geology who was my traveling companion told me this was not so. Each terrace, he said, represented a different period in which the waters which once covered all that region had receded.

Below the Peruvian ports is the nitrate coast of Chile. This is about as forbidding as any place along the entire stretch of 3,000 miles of coast. It is all without a sign of vegetation, and part of it is known as the Great White Desert of Atacama. But the Atacama desert is a region of vast wealth, because it contains the deposits of saltpetre or nitrate of soda which furnish fertilizers for all the world. Vast quantities of these fertilizers are shipped from Iquique and Antofagasta, many of the cargoes coming here for the use of American farmers.

The lower Chilean coast is more interesting because there the sandy mountains are lost and their places taken by the cordilleras, which are covered with vegetation of the temperate zone. Many of the snow caps are also visible. From the lower Chilean ports there are railways leading into the big central valley, an agricultural region as rich as any favored section of the United States. On any of the fundos or farms it is very interesting to note a group of mounted farm superintendents and overseers in their ponchos. Along this southern Chilean coast the Araucanian Indian population still exists, though there is much admixture of Spanish blood. The Araucanians were the most vigorous Indian race of South America. Some of them still preserve their pride of ancestry, and it is not unusual to meet with the caciques or chiefs who are training up their sons to be chiefs also.

Let Your People Decide

Let your people decide between home-baked beans and Van Camp's. Serve them both. We bake in live steam, so all beans are baked alike. No beans are crisped, no skins broken. They are nutty because they are whole. Learn if they like beans that way.

We bake the beans, the tomato sauce and the pork all together, and get a delicious blend. Ask if they think it tastes good.

We bake our beans at 245 degrees. That's twice the heat that gets to most of yours. The result is, our beans are digestible.

The particles are separated so the digestive juices can get to them.

Ask if that isn't better than having beans heavy. Having them ferment and form gas. For beans, to be digestible, must be factory cooked.

Leave the decision to those you serve. And be glad of their choice. For, think of the bother saved by having beans ready to serve; having your meals all cooked.

And think what you'll save on meat, when you serve beans good enough to largely take its place.

Van Camp's pork and beans baked with tomato sauce

It pays to serve the best beans, baked in the proper way. For beans are both choice and cheap. They give you a food value equal to meat, and at one-third the cost.

You will eat more beans when you know how good beans can be.

That's why we pay $2.10 per bushel to get the best beans grown. To have them picked out by hand, so we get only the cream of the crop. That's seven times what some beans cost.

And we spend five times as much to make our tomato sauce as other sauce costs ready-made. We want that sparkling zest which comes from vine-ripened tomatoes.

For the best beans are cheap enough. If we lessened our cost you would eat them less often. And serve in their place a costlier food, not so nutritious, not so good, as beans.

*International Sunday School Lesson for May 24. Jesus' Death and Burial. John 19: 28-42. GOLDEN TEXT: Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures. 1. Cor. 15: 3.

Jesus bare our sins in his own body on the tree (1. Peter 2: 24). The Lord hath laid on him—on Jesus—the iniquity of us all; and by his stripes we are healed—forgiven (Isa. 53: 5, 6). The blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin (1. John 1: 7). Little children, your sins are forgiven you for his name's sake (1. John 2: 12). I have blotted out as a thick cloud thy transgressions, and, as a cloud, thy sins (Isa. 45: 22).

And will these sins ever find us again? Have we not God's Word for it that "as far as the east is from the west, so far hath he removed our transgressions from us"? Where do the east and the west ever come together? Nowhere. What a figure is this then to describe the complete putting away of our sin through our Saviour? And we have the assurance in God's Word that "there is, therefore, no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus" (Rom. 8: 1).

Dr. Guthrie, the learned and eloquent Scotchman, has said: "It is alleged by travelers, that the ostrich, when pursued by its hunters, will thrust its head into a bush, and, without further attempt, either at flight or resistance, quietly submit to the stroke of death. Men say that, having thus succeeded in shutting the pursuers out of its own sight, the bird is stupid enough to fancy that it has shut itself out of theirs, and that the danger, which it has concealed from its eyes, has ceased to exist. It is because escape is hopeless and death is certain, that it has buried its head in that bush, and shut its eyes to a fate which it cannot avert. To man—rational and responsible man—belongs the folly of closing his eyes to a fate which he may avert, and thrusting his head into the bush while escape is possible; and because he can put death and judgment out of mind, living as if there were neither a bed of death nor bar of judgment."

Christ's death magnifies the law. No doubt he has "blotted out the handwriting of ordinances that was against us, and has taken it out of the way, nailing it to his cross." The reference in this is to the practice in Palestine, of a creditor, when his debt was discharged, driving a nail through the bond, to signify that it was canceled. Christ has done that. The ransom has been paid for us and is not to be paid over again by us.

Krummacher describes "the Cross as a rock against which the waves of the curse break; as a lightning conductor by which the destroying fluid descends which otherwise would have crushed the world."

Of all forms of jewelry we would say that the cross is most used. It is made of pearls, of amethysts, of rubies, of emeralds, of diamonds; in fact, of every sort of precious stone. In itself it is not beautiful, only two straight lines, but its beauty is in what it represents, the love of God for us, even while we were yet sinners. And the little child was right who called it "the key to heaven." How could one who is wearing a cross do an unkind or wicked act? Let us bear his image on our hearts, and not on the crosses which we wear, and we shall be all the more likely to follow him. A lady was wearing a beautiful

CHANGE IN FOOD

Works Wonders in Health

It is worth knowing that a change in food can relieve dyspepsia. "I deem it my duty to let you know how Grape-Nuts food has relieved me of indigestion. I had been troubled with it for years, until last year my doctor recommended Grape-Nuts food to be used every morning, followed instructions and now I am entirely well."

"The whole family like Grape-Nuts, we use four packages a week. You are welcome to use this testimonial as you see fit." The reason this lady was helped by the use of Grape-Nuts food, is that it is predigested by natural processes and therefore does not tax the stomach as the food she had been using; it also contains the elements required for building up the nervous system. That part of the human body is in perfect working order, there can be no dyspepsia, or nervous energy represents the steam that drives the engine.

When the nervous system is run down, the machinery of the body works badly. Grape-Nuts food can be used by small children as well as adults. It is perfectly cooked and ready for instant use.

cross of amethysts and pearls, and when questioned by a person as to what value she placed upon it, replied, "It is priceless, because it was given to me by my friend who is now dead." And so the Christian should esteem the Cross of Christ.

The inscription on the cross in Hebrew, Latin and Greek, was a silent prophecy that he to whom they referred would be the means of uniting those who spoke these languages in one common faith, and in acknowledging one common God and Saviour. And to-day that title might be written in more than four hundred languages. "For our King's drink the hyssop on the sponge! For our King's purple the slow trickling blood! For our King's courtiers the writhing thieves, this side and that! For our King's ministers those legionaries with the savage spears! For our King's praises gibes of passers by! For our King's throne the cruel torturing tree!"

Would any to-day crucify Christ? It was because the human heart is ever the same, and the spirit that rejected Christ is confined to no age, that Paul charges those who have rejected the invisible Christ with "crucifying the Lord afresh." Let us make sure that we have indeed crowned him "Lord of all" in our lives. It is said that on the eve of his martyrdom St. Peter had made his escape from Rome, having been persuaded by his friends to regain that liberty which he had been warned he must forfeit in his old age. He had not gone far along the Appian Way when he had covered me with the robe of righteousness. (Isa. 61: 10.)

When this passing world is done,
When has sunk yon glaring sun,
When I stand with Christ in glory,
Looking o'er life's finished story,
Then, Lord, shall I fully know
Not till then—how much I owe!

A pastor said, "Some years ago I was called upon at my house, and requested to see a little girl, seven years of age, who I was told was dying. She lived in a little back street. When I got there a woman showed me where this child was, and I sat down. 'What do you want, darling?' I then said, 'Well, sir,' said she, 'I wanted to see you before I die. I have a special favor to ask of you. Ever since I became a Christian I have been trying to bring father to the tabernacle, and he won't come; and I think if I die, you will bury me, won't you?' 'Yes, darling,' 'Well, I've been thinking, if I die, father must go to the funeral, then you will be able to preach the Gospel to him, and I would be willing to die if I could be quite sure that he would hear the Gospel once.' This was wondrous love that filled her little heart. She would be willing to die that her father might hear the Gospel once. Well, she went home as she had anticipated, and just as she was to have been buried, strangely enough, I was taken seriously ill myself. I was so grieved. I thought of the poor little thing, and I should so like to have buried her. Some time passed on and a rough-looking fellow called upon me and held out his hand. 'You do not know when he met face to face the vision of the risen Christ. "Lord, whither goest thou?" said the astonished Apostle. "I go to Rome to be crucified a second time!" was the reply. Peter understood the rebuke, and at once returned to the city to encounter the death that awaited him.

"The women . . . stood afar off beholding these things"

Sometimes it is harder to live for Christ than to die for him. A few years ago there came to Jerusalem from England a young man to be a missionary. Preparation for his work had been gained through great difficulties. One of his first converts was a young Mohammedan boy, whose home was on Mount Olivet. This boy soon became very ill with typhoid fever, and begged most earnestly that the missionary should come to see him. He came and spent several hours with the sick boy, and even laid down on the bed beside him. The result was that in a few days he became ill with the fever, and died, having been in Jerusalem scarcely eight months. The boy recovered, and his greatest ambition is that he shall be fitted to preach the Gospel in place of the young man who laid down his life for him.

"It is finished." What is finished? The robe of righteousness. We could not stand in the Heavenly Presence if we had on the garment of our own righteousness. "He hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness. (Isa. 61: 10.)

me?" "No, I do not." "I am the father of Mary, the father she was anxious about when she died, for I heard as how she said she would be willing to die if I could only be induced to hear the Gospel once. It nearly broke my heart, and now I want to join the church."

The Tomb of Christ to-day. Would you visit it? Seek it not in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem, but rather in the quiet garden. About four hundred feet northeast of the Damascus gate is the now famous "Skull Hill," believed by many scholars to be the true site of Calvary. In 1876 excavations were made which led to the recovery of the hallowed tomb. It is said: "It alone fulfils the numerous and precise descriptions and the point of the compass northward, indicated by the Scriptures." The sum of fifteen thousand dollars was paid for it by an association of English Christians.

And so they laid him to rest in the niche of the new rock-hewn tomb. Edersheim says: "It was probably about the same time that a noisy throng prepared to follow delegates from the Sanhedrin to the ceremony of cutting the Passover-sheaf. The Law had it, 'He shall bring a sheaf (literally, the omer) with the first fruits of your harvest unto the priest; and he shall wave the omer before Jehovah, to be accepted for you.'"

A Strange Church in London

SIX o'clock on Sunday evening. In one of London's dingiest side streets, a little crowd gathered at the doors of St. Mary at Hill Church. Suddenly those doors open, and the crowd makes way for a procession of men and girls carrying lamps, and accompanied by a brass band. When they have started on a short tour of the streets they are admitted to the church.

Here the pastor, the Rev. Wilson Carlile, greets strangers cordially. He offered the writer a seat in the Princess's pew. This man, who threw away the chance of a fortune to undertake mission work, wears the conventional surplice, but he is as unlike the conventional clergyman as the church is unlike other city churches. He carries a trombone and he rushes up and down the aisles before the service begins, giving instructions to the orchestra and organist, welcoming strangers, announcing solos and describing lantern pictures. Two large sheets are hung up, and on these are thrown a wonderful mixture of pictures, some sermonic, some lurid in their "old theology," some topical and dealing with events of the day. Some are cinematograph pictures, depicting events of the time. While they are flashed on the screens, organ and orchestra are combining in popular music.

Prebendary Carlile may be eccentric, but he fills his church. As, between six and seven o'clock, there are musical selections of all kinds, men and women stream into the building. A woman sings a solo, with pianoforte accompaniment. A large gramophone near the pulpit suddenly renders a lively selection. The organ (a fine old instrument) fills up all the gaps. Then, punctually at seven o'clock, the brass band returns to add to the harmony, Prebendary Carlile mounts the pulpit and announces the opening hymn, which, like everything else at this service, is thrown on the screen, and organ, orchestra, brass band and voices roll forth some old melody like "We Are Out on the Ocean Sailing," the band and choir marching meanwhile round the church.

Mr. Carlile draws into these strange services all conditions of men, down to the very lowest. Rough, bullet-headed fellows, many of them, with coat collars turned up, and close-cropped hair telling its own tale. A queer congregation! The ordinary Church of England service proceeds, but the preacher makes it extraordinary. He sounds blasts on his trombone, which can be heard above all the other instruments. He interpolates topical references in the prayers; he puts questions to the reader of the lesson; he talks freely to the congregation about events of the day; but at the back of it all is an earnest appeal to the best in the men and women before him. Most of the lantern pictures are object lessons. The hearty singing does everybody good, and the prayers and hymns and the confession being thrown on the screen, no prayer-books are needed. The congregation laughs one minute and cries the next. The sermon is usually a brief talk on some topic that has been filling the newspapers during the week.

After the sermon there is an open meeting, at which almost anybody may give testimony, or thank God for some blessing. The preacher loves to get one of his lieutenants and argue with him, and the dialogue shows how firm is the faith of the younger workers in the church army. The whole service is extraordinary. "Music-hall methods" some of the features introduced may be called. But every Sunday night the church is filled, and filled with men who could be got to go nowhere else, and the hearts have been changed of many who looked in just out of curiosity. Reverence may often seem to be lacking, but the old Gospel in song and picture goes right home.

HAROLD MURRAY.

JESUS ON THE CROSS

By MRS. M. BAXTER

IT was the common custom that a criminal who was condemned to be crucified should bear his cross to the place of execution, and Jesus bore his, but not alone. Simon the Cyrenian was compelled by the enemies of Jesus to bear it after him (Luke 23: 26). He had nearly died in Gethsemane, and their bitter, cruel vengeance would not be satisfied if he should be exhausted before he came to the cross.

He was not occupied with himself even in such an hour. "There followed him a great company of people, and of women, who also bewailed and lamented him" (Luke 23: 27). Having so little understood his teaching, their hopes of temporal deliverance through him were at an end; they loved him, they could not bear that he should suffer, but they were altogether nonplussed and astounded that this Man of mighty deeds should be at the mercy of men whom they saw to be so inferior to him. Had he lost his power? Was he, after all, not the Messiah? Oh had they taken to heart his own repeated teaching they would have understood his wondrous redemption work; they would have adored while they wept; they would have seen salvation accomplished in the one great Sin-offering; they would have beheld in him "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world." Jesus turned to them, and said, "Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me, but weep for yourselves, and for your children."

"They crucified him," and he, "for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, despising the shame" (Heb. 12: 2). Yet none can ever know what it was to Jesus to bear upon him sin and sin's consequences—sickness and death. How it could be that he who knew no sin, could yet bear our sins and be made sin for us; how he, in his perfection as a Man, could take our infirmities, and bear our sicknesses; how he who is the Resurrection and the Life could die, is a mystery beyond human knowledge and human language. Our hearts fail us when we think of his suffering—the spiritual, mental, physical suffering accumulated upon him at that terrible time. And he bore it willingly, he made a free-will offering of himself to God on our behalf, and he makes a free-will offering of his propitiation to you and to me. Precious, wondrous Jesus!

The clothing of one who was crucified was the perquisite of the executioners, and so the soldiers parted among them the garments of Jesus. But a passage of Scripture had to be fulfilled in order that no single proof of his identity as the Messiah should be wanting (Ps. 22: 18). "Now the coat was without seam, woven from the top throughout"—no doubt the work of Mary, his mother, or the other women who ministered unto him of their substance. "They said therefore among themselves, Let us not rend it, but cast lots for it whose it shall be, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, which saith, They parted my raiment among them, and for my vesture they did cast lots." Every prophecy regarding Jesus as the suffering Saviour was fulfilled in every detail, so that the Jews had no excuse for failing to recognize him.

To add to his humiliation, they crucified two thieves with him, on either side one, as though to prove to the assembled crowd that he was as they! But the only robbery Jesus was guilty of was the robbing Satan of his prey, and Death of his sting! This he continued to do on the cross. These very thieves took up the insolent cries of the priests, who, in their fancied victory and exultation, manifested the spirit they were of, and mockingly cried, "He saved others; himself he cannot save. Let Christ the King of Israel descend now from the cross, that we may see and believe" (Mark 15: 31, 32). It was the vulgar irony of a brutal mind which might befit a murderer, but did it befit the lips of chief priests. It was but the outcome of hearts full of all uncleanness! Yet they spoke the truth.

He saves others still, but no thought of sparing himself found a place in the heart of Jesus. He was, in every sense, a Sacrifice, and a complete one. "Himself he cannot save," because his wondrous love demands that he shall die! His arm was not shortened, he was the same Mighty One as ever, but he was giving the death-stroke to death by dying, the death-stroke to sin and sickness by bearing both, that so he that believeth should not bear either.

The Message

AS I stood before the gateway
Of the Master's harvest field,
To the tempter bending o'er me,
Lo, it seemed that I must yield;
For I felt so weak and weary
And unfit the task to try,
Till a voice within said, "Enter!
I will needed strength supply."

Then I could no longer falter,
But, obeying, took my stand
With the toilers in the vineyard,
Ready for the Lord's command.
To the weak the Master whispered,
"As thy day thy strength shall be;"
To the strong his message ever,
"Share the strength I give to thee."

But no need of marching orders,
For the Master's work is planned
So that every willing worker
Finds some service near at hand.
There the hopeless to encourage,
Weary, fainting hearts to cheer;
Smiles to scatter mid the shadows—
Bear the message, "Christ is near."

A POLICE CHIEF'S GOLDEN RULE

CHIEF OF POLICE KOHLER of Cleveland is very much in the public eye at present, owing to the "golden rule" policy which he has adopted. It is different from anything ever tried in police circles before. Chief Kohler has instructed all of his 400 policemen not to arrest first offenders for trivial misdemeanors, unless it is clear that the misdemeanor was committed with criminal or malicious intent. They are to warn a drunken man and help him home, instead of putting him in jail. First offenders found fighting are to be separated, reasoned with and allowed to go. Officers must keep a record of all prisoners released or warned.

The new plan has been in force only since the first of the present year. In two recent weeks under this plan the total number of arrests in Cleveland was but 400, compared with 1,200 for the same period a year ago. The felon or habitual violator, however, is to be dealt with as relentlessly as ever.

Chief Kohler says the object he wishes to attain is the disposal of trivial misdemeanors without arrest, and to prevent the humiliation and disgrace of persons who, through thoughtlessness, passion or temper, or in a spirit of frolic or mischief, have given cause to be considered offenders. He also desires to prevent the humiliation and disgrace of the offender's father, mother, brother, sister, wife or relatives, who are of good reputation or character.

The Gambler Turns Preacher

By W. R. DRAPER

A REMARKABLE scene was enacted in a church at Macon, Mo., on a recent Sunday afternoon. Five hundred men, many of whom had never been seen in church before, sat in front of a slight, pale-faced young man whom they had never known in any other capacity but that of a smooth and constantly successful gambler. They came to hear what "Walt" Bryant, a man who had made his living by gambling since he was sixteen, had to say about his old life, and whether he was going to lambast the fellows who had "trained" with him.

The convert had nothing but kind words for those who had sat with him at the gambling table. A collection was taken up according to Methodist fashion, and the proceeds tendered him, but he refused to touch a penny of it.

"I come to you, my friends," said the ex-gambler with emotion, "with a new tongue and a new heart. Not to chide, not to say one word that will rankle in your breasts, but that you may find the peace which I have found."

Bryant was visibly agitated, but he seemed tremendously in earnest. He purposely avoided going very much into detail about his former profession, for fear that some of the boys present might learn things about cards and their manipulation, and might be inclined to experiment.

"You nearly always win at first," he said, "and thinking you have the combination, you keep on. Then maybe you will become so adept that you may become known as a 'swift man.' Then you have a reputation to maintain, for the gambler calls his ability his reputation. You devote time and thought to the working out of a system. If you stay in the business you must devote a wonderful amount of study to keep up with and beat the men against whom you play. They are doing the same thing to defeat you. The lawyer devotes no more care and pains to looking up legal technicalities which may help him to get the better of his opponent in the courts than does the professional gambler in devising systems and plays to win the other man's money."

"Many and many a night have I sat with pencil and paper figuring out a new line of tactics designed to overmatch card generals, against whom a battle has been planned. Then you go at it like trained athletes in the arena. It is a contest of brain against brain. You are going to do anything to win. You know your opponent will not hesitate to take any advantage. The prize is money—the root of all evil, it is said. The hours go by, but you care not. The night runs into day and the streets below begin to hum with the activity of labor, but you do not notice it. At last your man sighs, puts his hands in his pockets, and says:

"I'm all in!"

"You arise the victor. Tired and hungry as a famished sailor, but you've won. You've beaten a cardplayer, who, perhaps, has journeyed a hundred miles to beat you, and who was up on all the tricks of the game. You've practically ruined him."

"But an expert cardplayer doesn't let his conscience worry him. He parts with that when he goes into the business, else he'd never sleep. He reasons if he didn't 'do' the other fellow the other fellow would 'do' him, and the shallow philosophy satisfies him."

"But when I came under the Saviour's influence, I looked at things differently. I saw that it would have been better for me to have urged that man to keep his money for his wife and children, who needed it. I saw that if I had devoted the same amount of study and energy to a calling that could have been followed out in the open—one that exacted the same skill and effort—I could have made as much money. I saw that my wife would have preferred the plain garments for herself and child that came from money earned by the day's labor, rather than the diamonds and silks and stylish costumes that I had been providing for them by the revenue from the gambler's table."

When Bryant concluded his talk he asked those who had been his old comrades at the gaming table, those who had believed in him and wanted his prayers, to walk up and shake hands with him. Over half of the audience promptly responded to his appeal.

Bryant a few months ago abandoned a profession as manager of a gambling house in Hannibal to take a job in the shoe factory there at $8 a week. He was converted at a revival meeting conducted by Evangelist J. E. Brown, was immersed at the Fifth Street Baptist Church and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. He took his loaded dice, marked cards and other adjuncts to an up-to-date gambling outfit, out in the back yard and burned them up.

The Sweetest Verse

A young Christian, at the death-bed of an aged saint, said to him, "Shall I read to you the sweetest verse of the Bible?" "Yes." The young man read the second verse of John 14, "In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so I would have told you; for I go to prepare a place for you." "No," said the dying man, that is not the sweetest verse. Read on." The young man read, "And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am, there ye may be also." "That is the sweetest verse," said the dying man. "It is not the mansions, it is Himself I want."

Ask Your Dealer For Alabastine

You can make your home brighter, more cheerful and more sanitary by decorating the walls with Alabastine, and you will then have the most artistic of all backgrounds for your pictures and furnishings. The soft velvety Alabastine tints are both dainty and restful.

You can have your entire home decorated in one harmonious color scheme, carrying out your individual taste and ideas in each room, and making the walls blend perfectly within the wood-work, rugs and furniture.

You can avoid the dirt and bother of kalsomine, the sameness of wall-paper patterns and the unsanitary condition that invariably follows their use, by having your home decorated with

Alabastine

The Sanitary Wall Coating

Alabastine is less expensive than wall-paper and far more satisfactory than kalsomine. It will neither fade, rub off nor scale, and it affords no breeding place for insects or disease germs. Anyone can apply Alabastine with a flat wall brush. Alabastine comes in sixteen tints and white. These tints can be intermixed to form an endless variety of shades.

Alabastine can also be used in relief work—raised decorative motifs—effects that cannot otherwise be obtained. Alabastine hardens and becomes a part of the wall itself. You can therefore apply a new tint right over the old Alabastine, without washing and scraping, as is necessary when wall-paper or kalsomine has been used, or is used again.

Alabastine is sold in carefully sealed and properly labeled packages at 50c for white and 55c for tints, by all Paint, Drug, Hardware and General Stores. See that the name "Alabastine" is on each package before it is opened either by yourself or the painter.

Send 10c in coin or U. S. stamps for the book "Dainty Wall Decorations," which contains complete plans in color for decorating homes, churches and school houses in dainty Alabastine tints. Sample tint cards and descriptive circulars mailed free on request.

Home for Nation's Consumptives

just at present, for one hundred patients. The accommodations will be extended, however, in the form of new pavilions or tent houses, as fast as required. Any church or society that may be supporting a sufferer may send the patient to Alamo Gordo, confident that Mr. Moody will accord him or her a Christian welcome.

The property consists at present of a square mile of land secured from the government, and buildings erected at a cost of $60,000. Patients who arrive in the winter remain through the summer, too; there is no excessive heat, just as there is no excessive cold. Rainfall and snow are practically nothing.

The president of this institution is Mr. W. R. Eidson, a wealthy banker and business man of St. Louis and Alamo Gordo. He and others were induced by Mr. Moody to furnish the capital for the erection of a sanatorium of the kind described and for the purpose of taking care of patients of the smallest means. A company was formed to operate solely on benevolent lines. Any possible profits are returned to form a charitable fund to be used for the benefit of patients. In his address at the founding of the institution, Mr. Eidson said:

"Under the charter of this institution no man can obtain any personal rights or derive any individual profit. It is an institution that belongs to the people who contribute to its support. It is a great humanitarian movement with a great future in the way of doing good. The doors of this sanatorium will be thrown open to the consumptives of the whole country, and every sufferer will be cared for at the actual cost of keeping, whether paid for by himself, or by his church, or brotherhood, or society, or lodge. In addition, we shall use every effort to raise a charity fund for the care of penniless sufferers." While plans were forming for the building of the sanatorium, Dr. P. M. Rixey, Surgeon-General of the United States Army, wrote: "I have been looking into the climatology of New Mexico lately, and am of the opinion that your location is a good one, your object most laudable, and the result can but be most beneficial to the class who need and will get the benefits of such an institution. I wish you all success in adding to the already too few institutions for combating tuberculosis in this country."

Secretary Taft, at a recent meeting in Washington for the discussion of tuberculosis, spoke of the government institutions in New Mexico, a few miles from Alamo Gordo, as follows: "I came here to-day to testify by my presence to the importance of finding a way to combat tuberculosis. We have in the army a place where we think we cure tuberculosis; and we not only think it, but we believe it, because we send men there who have it and they come back without it. I brought here a man to convince you of the fact. General Edwards was certainly afflicted with the disease. He went to Fort Bayard. He was treated there, stayed several months under treatment, and he has come back as strong and able to resist disease as any soldier in the army. The same thing happened with respect to Judge Robb, whose going to Fort Bayard I was able to facilitate by making the order."

The sanatorium at Fort Bayard, New Mexico, maintained by the government for the treatment of consumptives from the army, and the one at Fort Stanton, New Mexico, for the benefit of the Marine Hospital Service—referred to in the above letters—have shown by their high percentage of cures what the climate, coupled with proper medical attention, is capable of doing. The Fraternal City Sanatorium is midway between these two government institutions.

My stay at this Christian home for consumptives comprised the busiest six weeks I have ever spent in the Southwest. The longer I stayed, and the more I saw how that sanatorium managed to support the kind of home that thousands of sufferers need, the more I became convinced that to help consumptives should become a part of my life-work. And how could I make a better start than by telling the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD something about this home in New Mexico? Your daughter, your son, your wife or other relative, may be looking for a place in the great health belt of the Southwest. Your greatest problem and theirs is to locate such a place and to learn from one who has been there all the facts concerning it.

I will gladly give any inquirers every possible help within my power to get their dear ones or friends to the home where they will have a fighting chance for the prolonging of life, if those interested will address Gilson Willets, care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Christ's Winnowing Fan

they were invited to offer a pinch of incense at the heathen altar, they refused with one short, telling phrase: "Christianus sum!" That is to say: "I am a Christian!" That was enough. It did not seem to them thinkable that a Christian should buy his life at such a price. The arena might be waiting, the wild beasts ready, or the flaming torches kindled which were to light their way to death. But, "Christianus sum!" What is all that to me since I am a Christian? This day of ours calls for deep resolve, for chivalry, for consecration, and for heroism, if not for martyrdom, and, amid the conflicts to which Christ calls every one of you and the temptations which may await you, I pray that your courage may be equal to every test, and that in word and work and life you may answer him whose fan is in his hand: "Christianus sum!"

A Subscriber's Missionary Work
MRS. J. L. STECK, 47 Ravina Avenue, Jersey City, N. J., who has for many years subscribed for a number of copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for every company in the fire department and every police station of Jersey City, writes as follows:

"I hope God will bless each paper and accomplish the work whereunto it is sent, and may others whom God has blessed follow in other cities. One CHRISTIAN HERALD in an engine house means that twelve to fifteen men see it. I think so much of this kind of mission work that, although I have been very sick for the last twenty-one months and am yet in bed, I have mentioned this to be continued in my will, as long as the amount appropriated will last. I am sure there are many who could and would (if they thought of the amount of good it can do) do the same. These people (especially in the fire department) have plenty of time, and are deprived of the privileges which we enjoy Sundays and during the week. May God bless these words!"

Coffee Toppers as Bad as Others

"A friend of our family who lived with us a short time was a great coffee drinker and continual sufferer with dyspepsia. He admitted that coffee disagreed with him, but you know how the coffee drinker will hold on to his coffee, even if he knows it causes dyspepsia."

"One day he said to me that Postum Food Coffee had been recommended and suggested that he would like very much to try it. I secured a package and made it strictly according to directions. He was delighted with the new beverage, as was every one of our family. He became very fond of it and in a short time his dyspepsia disappeared. He continued using the Postum and in about three months gained twelve pounds."

"My husband is a practicing physician and regards Postum as the healthiest of all beverages. He never drinks coffee, but is very fond of Postum. In fact, all of our family are, and we never think of drinking coffee any more." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a reason."

In the Spirit of Dorcas

MRS. W. R. MARSHALL, of Stratford, Ont., Canada, passed away recently at the ripe old age of seventy-eight years. Mrs. Marshall had long been known as an active Christian, identified with many good works. She was a native of England and came to Canada with her parents while still very young. She was married in 1856, and in 1906 she and her husband, a retired merchant, celebrated their golden wedding.

The Late Mrs. W. R. Marshall

Mrs. Marshall took a special interest in leper missions, and was president of the local Foreign Missionary Society for years. Through her efforts an asylum for lepers was built in India, and she personally supported some of the lepers in charge of Rev. W. P. Byers, missionary at Asansol, India. She was a member of the Baptist Church, and for many years had charge of the infant class in the Sunday School. In the cause of temperance she took a deep interest, and was at one time president of the local branch. Her life was like that of Dorcas, and among Christian, temperance and charitable workers, and throughout a wide circle of acquaintances, she was honored and esteemed for her kindness of heart and her efforts to promote the welfare of others.

Besides her husband, a family of five sons and two daughters survive her. It can truly be said of her that she spent her life in doing good. She was a reader of this paper and deeply interested in its worldwide work.

Divine Protection*

HOW precious must have been Christ's words of encouragement to his followers, in the years of persecution following his departure from the world. He did not promise them immunity from suffering nor even from martyrdom, but he assured them of sympathy and support under trial. When they were arraigned before the unjust tribunals he assured them that words should be given them for their defense, and that in prison and on the scaffold the divine presence should be with them. That promise strengthened and supported the early Christians to a degree that caused them to be the marvel of the world. Weak men and delicate women went cheerfully to torture and death in the confidence that those words gave, so that men accustomed to witnessing heroism on the battlefield were amazed at the courage and fortitude displayed by those humble victims. In succeeding ages Christians suffered and died heroically inspired by the same promise and even down to our own time the same heroism has been manifested in the South Seas, in China, India and elsewhere.

What is the secret of this wonderful transformation of character? What is it that renders frail men and women spiritually daring? How is it that the physical courage that despises death on the battlefield is exhibited by feeble invalids, aged men and women and even children? It is the inspiration that we read of as coming from "Beholding Him who is invisible." We know not how it comes, nor how the process of faith operates, but of the fact there is no doubt. In some way known to himself God does support those who put their trust in him. He does not undertake to keep them from financial ruin, from physical suffering and death. If he did there would be no heroism in loyalty to him; but the promise of his support avails and his grace is sufficient for every crisis.

Christians as Voters*

UNDER our form of government there are overwhelming reasons for the Christian remembering his Christianity as he exercises his rights of citizenship. The policy and destiny of his country depend upon him. Under an autocrat, and to some extent under a constitutional monarch, he necessarily leaves the responsibility to those who claim to hold the divine commission to govern; but here, if the nation is degraded by iniquity and if its policy becomes wicked, the fault is with the people. We speak of the masses, of the public, but after all the public consists of individuals, with individual responsibility. No man can hide his responsibility among the millions whose votes are cast at a Presidential election, any more than he can evade it when he sits as a juror. The decision is his decision, unless he protests and does all in his power at the ballot box to make his protests effective by his vote. He has the right to strive to influence others, but he is personally responsible for his vote, whether he succeeds or fails to exert that influence.

This view of the responsibility of citizenship is indissolubly bound up with the Christian's attitude and influence in the community. He is set as a light, as "a city set on a hill," and he has no conception of the extent of his influence. It is no defense to a wrong cause, or an inconsistent vote, that he is bound by party loyalty. His party is not to be weighed against loyalty to Christ and his cause. If he insists on casting his vote according to his conscience, the party leaders will not be slow to learn that the nominations must be of a character to insure his support. The proposal to nominate an unprincipled man or a man of irreligious character will be recognized as impolitic, and so his attitude may exert an influence that even a politician must heed.

A Well-Deserved Tribute

TO aid the campaign to increase the membership of the Red Cross, a meeting of the New York State Branch was held in New York City on Tuesday, April 28. Patriotism and work for humanity were the themes of all the speeches and the decoration of the Astor Gallery of the Waldorf Astoria, where the friends of the movement assembled, were arranged to emphasize this double mission of the Red Cross. The Stars and Stripes were draped in graceful festoons from pillars and boxes and in the centre of each festoon was the banner of the society. Col. William Sanger, president of the State Branch, presided, and Secretary Taft delivered the principal address. At its beginning the Secretary paid a graceful and well-deserved tribute to Miss Mabel Boardman, of Washington, whose tact, untiring zeal and love for the work of the Red Cross has done so much to arouse public interest in the organization.

"I am here as the president of the American National Red Cross," said the Secretary. "I became so at the request of a lady with whose work I have the most profound sympathy. She informed me in 1905 that I would be a mere figurehead of the society and that is what I am. The real spirit of the American Red Cross, the real president who directs the work, is Miss Mabel Boardman, of Washington. I have had occasion to proclaim this fact in different parts of the country, and she asked me not to mention it this afternoon. I have obeyed in so far as was consistent with my duty."

The enthusiastic applause which burst from all parts of the hall showed how much the Secretary's remarks were appreciated and what an honored place in public esteem Miss Boardman has made for herself by her humanitarian work.

Fairy Soap

Good soap is naturally white. If coloring matter or high perfumes are incorporated, they add nothing to the virtue or efficiency of the product—more often they are used to cover up the inferior quality of the raw materials and the greasy smell.

FAIRY SOAP, though it sells for but 5c a cake, is the equal of any 25c or 50c soap on the market. It is made from edible products, and is just as pure and high grade as any soap can be—contains no free alkali, no coloring matter and no adulterants.

In buying FAIRY SOAP, you get the highest possible grade for the lowest possible price.

*(N.R.) means "No Rosin." SUNNY MONDAY LAUNDRY SOAP contains no rosin. Rosin is an adulterant and will rot and ruin clothes. Because it is all soap, one bar of SUNNY MONDAY LAUNDRY SOAP will do the work of two bars of any other laundry soap.

Questions and Answers

I. M. P., Washington, Pa. Would you give me any information you can concerning a small country in Europe in which the people use the ancient Latin language?

There is no country in which Latin is the every-day speech of the people. The romance languages, French, Italian, Spanish, etc., are derived from old Latin. In the Vatican at Rome, Latin is spoken to a certain extent, and it is the official language of the Roman Church. In no place, however, is it spoken as a means of ordinary communication. It is a dead language, and scholars are in doubt as to the ancient pronunciation, most nations giving the letters the sounds found in their own tongue.

R. M. E., Cincinnati, O. Did Christ give to his disciples the power to forgive sins by his promise in John 20: 23, and if so, is that power continued to the clergy in this day?

They had not the power to forgive the impenitent. Christ would never give them that. There are some people who repent, and yet live on under the apprehension that their sins are not forgiven. Christ conferred on his disciples the power to assure those who repent and put their trust in him that their sins were forgiven, and every Christian has the same power. An explicit pledge was necessary in those days, because the Gospel was new to the world, and the disciples might have been in doubt on the question, and their hearers might have had the same doubt. There is only one way of getting forgiveness, and if a man takes that he will get it. He does not need any man to assure him of it, or rather he should not; he has the better assurance of God's word. But human assurance may relieve his mind, and that any Christian may do if he is really penitent. If he is not penitent the sins will be retained, no matter what assurance a priest may give him.

F. McN., Germantown, Pa. What are the average salaries or yearly incomes of the leading evangelists, and how do they compare with the salaries of our high public officials and bank and railroad presidents?

We have no positive means of learning the figures regarding evangelists' salaries. Their spiritual vocation requires great concentration and special training, and they are never employed the whole year through, but only at certain seasons. In view of these facts, they should be well paid for the good work they do. But even the best paid are poorly recompensed compared with the princely salaries received by many men in other lines of business. It is said that the chief consulting engineer of a great mining magnate receives $500,000 a year. Many executive officers in banks and railroads are getting $50,000 to $100,000.

Reader, Scranton, Pa. Does God send out evil spirits as stated in I. Samuel 16: 14?

God sends punishment on the disobedient and rebellious, which was probably what the writer meant. Every source of good becomes a source of trial and punishment if disobeyed. The fire that warms and comforts, brings ruin when misapplied. The law that protects us in our homes, imprisons the criminal. Paul said (II. Cor. 2: 16) that the preaching of the Gospel operated in the same way. It was a blessing to those who accepted it, but a curse to those who rejected it. It involved a terrible responsibility. The spirit mentioned in Samuel was evil only in that it produced misery by reminding Saul of what he had lost.

L. P. H., Falmouth, Mass. Was Christ anointed more than once?

It is a disputed point, but on the whole the commentators think the evidence is in favor of two anointings. It is difficult to harmonize Luke's account with those of the other evangelists. They represent the incident as occurring in the last week of our Lord's life, Luke mentions it as immediately after the Sermon on the Mount; they describe it as being in the house of Simon or more indefinitely at Bethany, Luke as being in the house of a Pharisee; they represent the disciples as objecting, Luke says it was the Pharisee; they say that Christ said it was done in anticipation of his burial, in Luke Christ gives a totally different answer (see Luke 7: 40-48). There are other differences, which lead to the belief that Luke is describing one incident and the other evangelists another.

E. Y., Norristown, Pa. What is the stole used in the church dress of priests in the Roman and Anglican churches?

It is a thin strip of silk worn over the shoulders and passing back of the neck. The color changes in accordance with the seasons of the church. Symbolically it represents the yoke of Christ.

H. C. W., Jamaica, N. Y. 1. How does The Wandering Jew rank among first class stories? 2. What distinguishes it most?

1. Among the most popular of works by French authors of stories of the mysterious ample you may lead weaker ones into sin and possibly be the means of their spiritual destruction.

I. C. W., Gaithersburg, Md. What does "Erin go braugh" mean?

Ireland forever.

T. M. Scott, Morden, Manitoba. 1. Do you believe a person who gives a tenth of his income to the Lord will be blessed temporally as well as spiritually? 2. Should capital as well as income be taxed?

1. We think so, providing the giver does not regard the gift as constituting an obligation which God is bound to fulfill. You cannot purchase God's blessing by the payment of money. Jacob supposed he could (Gen 28: 20-22), but he had to learn by painful experience that it was by changed character and not by gifts that God's favor was gained. Micah directly negatives the idea that God can be bribed (Micah 6: 7, 8). David expresses the same conviction (Ps. 51: 16, 17). Christ himself repudiates the idea in his parable of the laborers (Matt. 20: 10-16), showing that people who try to make a bargain with God must not expect special ing to Bishop Ussher's chronology, about six thousand years have passed since Adam and Eve lived in the Garden of Eden. Ussher's computations, however, are no a part of the Bible, but are calculation made in the seventeenth century. The Bible itself gives no clue to the age of the world but simply says, "in the beginning." Discoveries by archaeologists in the Orient have brought to light statues and tablets with inscriptions, showing them to be between 6,500 and 7,500 years old, and these point to a still earlier civilization. Prof. Agassiz is said to have unearthed a skeleton in Florida, whose age he computed to be over 20,000 years. We cite these figures to show how vague and speculative the average computation is on this subject.

P. P., Esmond, N. D. Do the cruelties to natives of the Congo by white representatives of the Belgian king continue?

According to latest reports of missionaries and correspondents, conditions have improved in the Congo, the natives now being given an opportunity to tell of any grievances before certain government agents.

R. K. W., Collingwood, Canada. Which President of the United States kissed his mother at the inaugural ceremony in the sight of the multitude?

James A. Garfield. His mother was to him one of the inspirers of his career and he chose this means of honoring her out of the gratitude in his heart at the moment for the debt he owed her. The action was not theatrical, but entirely spontaneous.

F. L., Richmond, Va. The "big hat" fad, which is blossoming out here as elsewhere, is proving an annoyance in churches, at concerts, etc. What is to be done about it? As a Southerner, I would not be so ungallant as to suggest that our ladies deprive themselves of the pleasure (I suppose it is a pleasure), of parading these monstrous headpieces in public, but surely one might intimate, ever so delicately, that they might yield so far as to wear something else in a place of public assemblage. Why not a "church hat" for ladies? Here is a money-making idea for some clever milliner.

It would be a most grateful boon if our correspondent's suggestion could be carried into practical effect. Why should not Sorosis or the D. A. R., or even the W. C. T. U., take up the subject of hat reform and popularize a church or lecture hat for ladies that would be seemly and acceptable? We gladly publish the suggestion for what it is worth. Apropos, three of the leading churches in an Indiana city have just put a ban on the prevalent "big hat," by resolving that it must be removed by the wearer "during the preaching of the sermon." Why not during the whole service?

A girl must be twenty-one before she becomes independent of her legal guardian.

B. M., Raleigh. Can a man be a good Christian and play cards? I do not mean to play for drink or gamble, but to play as in a game of letters, authors, dominoes, etc.?

The true Christian will do nothing whereby he may place a stumbling-block in the way of another. While card-playing may in itself be innocent enough, it is a practice which has proved the first step to ruin to countless multitudes. On the other hand, man's moral, spiritual or mental character has never been improved in the slightest degree by card-playing. It is not an accomplishment that wins for a man esteem and confidence either in business or in private life, but the reverse. For the professed follower of Christ to attempt to justify this dangerous and evil pastime is an incomprehensible inconsistency. See Rom. 14: 15-21. Apply the fixed principle that "it is good not to do anything whereby thy brother stumbleth," and you will never touch another card, lest by ex-favors, while they who do good spontaneously expecting no reward are abundantly blessed. The same idea is reiterated in the parable of the judgment (Matt. 25: 44), in which the givers had actually forgotten that they had given. Paul is in agreement (see I. Cor. 13: 3). Give by all means; give a tenth and more; it is a duty and a privilege; but do not give as an investment. 2. No; to continually tax the capital is to have it disappear eventually. The interest on the capital and the earnings of the year are the legitimate material for taxation.

G. A. B., Maiden Rock, Wis. Was the earth formed a good many thousand years before the Bible was written? Is there any way of knowing just how long it has been since God created Adam and Eve?

The age of the earth is so much older than any definite time mentioned in theological text-books that no approximately exact computation can be made. Accord-

Officials in Carnival Parade

Our Correspondent Visits Gov.-Gen. Smith, Who Tells How the Philippines Grow Under American Rule

Evelyn Clark Morgan

MANILA has had its first carnival. Business men and other public-spirited citizens put energy and money into it and made it a success. Now it seems pretty well assured that a yearly carnival will add to the attractions of America's Oriental capital. Nothing the Filipino appreciates so much as a "fiesta," and it would be hard to find a better setting for a carnival scene than Manila. When their majesties of the Orient sailed out on the bay to meet the king and queen of the Occident, they had apparently called to its surface the choicest denizens of the sea to follow in their mimic train. The land parade, beneath tall palms and scarlet flame trees just bursting into bud, was scarcely less effective, and in the royal pavilion, where the evening festivities were held, the fragrance of tropical flowers perfumed the air.

The cockpit proved a failure financially. Owing to this fact and the protest made by the ministers and many citizens (including 700 Filipino youths), the cock-pit bid fair not to be a feature of future carnivals.

Many things are being done for the betterment of conditions in the Philippines. On March 1, 1908, the law against the sale of opium went into effect. All opium dispensaries were closed and the Philippines took the lead over the rest of the world in this great reform.

On March 2 the corner-stone of the Philippines General Hospital was laid. This is the first hospital to be built since American rule and is of vast importance to the Filipino people.

The walls of the city are being pierced, but not destroyed, here and there for the convenience of the people of Manila. The Spanish trait of indirectness was shown in the gates of old Manila. It was formerly necessary to go almost around the enclosure of the "walled city" to find an entrance. In leafy San Luis and other streets sewers are being laid, and sanitation is now so complete that Manila may well claim to be the cleanest city of the Orient.

By EVELYN CLARK MORGAN

When my host, Rev. G. W. Wright, president of Ellinwood Theological Seminary, told me that Governor-General Smith had invited him to bring me to the palace, I was delighted to have this opportunity of talking with the Governor about the Philippines and Filipinos. He gave us a hearty welcome. He talked freely about conditions in the islands, and when I asked him what moral and social progress was being made, replied:

"Well, first of all, the Filipinos are not an immoral people, according to their lights," and he repeated, as if to give emphasis, "according to their lights and understanding. Socially, they are a courteous and polite people. I am speaking more particularly of the higher and educated classes, although even the other classes are innately polite. A Filipino gentleman doesn't meet a lady guest at the door of the reception room, but receives her at the foot of the stairs, and escorts her up, and when she leaves, he accompanies her to the bottom of the flight."

"The different dialects must impede both education and progress," I suggested, and repeated what a missionary had told me, that in a seven hours' journey he had been in seven provinces and found five different dialects spoken, and that the native men with him all carried bolos, though he had thought it best to go unarmed.

"Yes and yes," said the general. "The dialects of course make it more difficult to reach the people. They are not a bad sort, but they need education, and that is what will tell. It is doing the work slowly but surely. The results are already felt, but it will take time. We must depend upon the rising generations. Catch them young," laughed the general; "that's the only way. It is the lesson at the mother's knee that counts. When hearts get hardened with time, you can't make much impression. As to the question of carrying arms, if you wish to inspire confidence, you must show it. I go about without guard or escort of any kind, and even when I am up north among the head-hunters, I go unarmed."

"How about the Spanish population? How do they like our rule?" I asked.

"They are a proud people, and it is hard for them to forget the war, but that is natural," said the Governor, in the broad, tolerant spirit I had noticed throughout his conversation. "We should be the same, under similar conditions."

Just then our conversation was interrupted by the announcement and then the entrance of Dr. Hayes, an American, who is physician to the King of Siam. Dr. Hayes was here to attend the International Medical Convention. He wore full dress uniform, and came at the request of the King to bring complimentary and congratulatory messages from the latter to the Governor-General. After some formalities, in which "His Majesty" and "Your Excellency" figured largely, the conversation turned upon the progress of the islands under American rule.

"When I came to Manila five years ago," said the doctor, "I could not get away soon enough; now I leave with regret. The development and improvement have been wonderful. The thing with which I am most impressed and which pleases me immensely, is the advance made along scientific lines. The laboratory is the finest I have seen anywhere, and I have seen many, including Johns Hopkins. It may interest you to know," he continued, "that the first original scientific research in Siam came from Manila. Dr. Wooley came to us (Dr. Hayes has been twenty-six years in Siam)

The Little Sins of Good People

TEXT—Song of Solomon 2: 15

"The little foxes that spoil the vineyards"

PEOPLE who of set purpose are hostile to man's law and God's law, and are trying to make a living by criminal practices, are not exceedingly numerous. It is not alone what we call great, coarse crimes and misdemeanors which give to a city or community a low moral tone of life. In fact, the actual out-breaking sins which call for human punishment probably do not create as much trouble in the long run as what we call the little sins of life, which persist in the community as a whole, lower its ethical standard, deaden its spiritual enthusiasm and make impossible what we call growth in the higher life. In mentioning a few of the little foxes which destroy the beautiful vineyard of Christian character we do so not in a spirit of cynical fault-finding but for the purpose of reminding ourselves, perhaps, of errors so common that we are not duly conscious of them, and also for the larger purpose of giving us an insight into sins which can be corrected and should be driven out of the Christian life.

Fault-Finding

I have asked a number of people to tell me what they thought were the besetting little sins of what we call good people, that is, church members, themselves included, and in reciting these as they have been given me I am not imagining little faults which do not occur, but those which the people themselves have declared to be in existence. A common weakness among good people as well as others is fault-finding. One prominent journalist in the city said he thought the whole city was glad to find something wrong on every occasion, and cited instances where his own paper, sending out reporters for news, was constantly facing the fact that the reporters' definition of news was oftenest to get something that was going wrong, and emphasize the fact to the community, on the theory, which seemed to be borne out by the facts, that the readers of the papers in this city would gloat more or less over the fact of wrong-doing and be ready to condemn and find fault with anything which was not right or with matters which were partly right and partly wrong; more rejoiced, however, to find something which needed to be smitten, than to find something which was worthy of praise. It is a common notion, I think, in a large part of the newspaper world, at least, that the best news is a bad story. This is the assumption that most of the great dailies go upon, and without exception all the yellow journals. Goodness, they say, is not news; but scandal, crime, misdemeanors, failures in administration, crookedness in public life or private affairs—these things are news.

This fault-finding, however, exists in petty ways through the lives of otherwise good people to the spoiling of the vineyards of life. Most of us say we know some persons who are continually fault-finding. They remind us of Sheridan's "School for Scandal." No person is so good, no one is striving so hard to be good that some evil thing cannot be said about him. Flaws are picked in the best things and in the best people. The attitude of fault-finding, when it becomes chronic, is a cancer in the character; the bloom is rubbed off of the fairest fruit and flower. In itself it seems like a little fox, but multiplied by the increasing habit, it becomes an army that destroys. It is well for us to take account of this habit if we have it even in the smallest degree, and root it out. There is a difference, of course, between honest, fair-minded criticism and what we call hateful or destructive criticism, and even criticism is worth very little anywhere, whether it is in art or literature or in the rightful judgment of public conduct, unless it is made for the purpose of bettering conditions. No Christian ought to indulge in destructive criticism which does not have for its end the upbuilding of something. If a thing needs to be broken in pieces let us break it, and then immediately construct something to take its place.

Worrying

Another little fox that destroys the vineyards is the common habit among even Christian people of worry. Edward Everett Hale says, "Most people carry about with them three kinds of trouble; all they have ever had, all they are having now, and all they expect to have." George MacDonald says, "If you have a disagreeable duty to perform on Friday do not blacken the hours of Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday thinking about it." As long ago as Seneca lived that wise old philosopher said, "Though sorrow must come, where is the advantage of rushing to meet it? It will be time enough to grieve when it comes. Meanwhile hope for better things." Whoever is Josh Wise says, "The man that has got troubles and the man that thinks he has are in the same fix." The Rev. Robert J. Burdette says, "There are two days about which nobody should ever worry, and these are yesterday and to-morrow." Honoré de Balzac, that wonderful deliver into human passions and motives, who conceived a plan of fiction which was to embrace the whole range of human energy, said: "Feeble natures live in their sorrows instead of converting them into apothegms of experience. To forget is the great secret of strong and creative existence. To forget after the manner of nature, which knows no past and begins again every hour the mysteries of her indefatigable productiveness." Most of us know persons who have met with bereavement. Great and loving souls have gone out of our lives in the earthly existence. We treasure their memories, we are thankful for their participation with our struggles, and then we live continually in the atmosphere of our grief. There are Christian people who have lost their usefulness largely from the moment of some family bereavement. They have dropped out of the work of the church. They have ceased to take an interest in humanity. They revolve continually in the little circle of their own mourning. They have become tremendously selfish instead of tremendously loving out of an experience which was not intended to drive men and women back into the secret place of mourning, but was intended to make their spirits more rich and more helpful on account of the trial which was meant to try them as gold is tried in the fire. Many and many a soul that has called Christ Master has made woeful mistake by nourishing a private grief to the rubbing out of a public service. This is to carry the habit of worry to the last extreme. It is one of the little foxes that gnaw at the tender buds of the life in the vineyard and finally spoil it.

Indifference

Another besetting sin of good people which was often mentioned was indifference to the welfare of the public. It was not long ago that this community was aroused over the question of law enforcement on account of the condition of the city. There was a wave of indignation, of protest, of public disapproval. It subsided, although the conditions apparently have not changed. I suppose it is not possible for human beings to live up on the high ground of indignation at evil at a white heat all the time. Nevertheless there should exist in the soul of a Christian always a spirit of indignation at wrong, always the same spirit of protest in the heart and the never ceasing effort in every way to better social conditions. If it is true, as very many say, that this city is as corrupt now as it was several months ago, if it is true that the mayor and others associated with him are as derelict in their duty now as ever, there is no good excuse for indifference as to the situation. Very many good citizens feel as if there was no hope of doing anything under present conditions and are simply waiting for an opportunity at the next election to put better men into office. If that is the fact there will be no excuse for the good people of this city if they do not carry out that resolution when election day comes, and I believe if we do not succeed in electing the right men for county attorney and sheriff and mayor the blame will rest entirely with indifferent good people who would not take the time from their business or their professional career to register—men who are living good enough lives themselves, who would be horrified at the thought of their children going into a joint or a house of vice, but who, when the only means is offered to them for the enforcement of law through good men, ignore it because they do not wish to take the trouble to do their part. There is always a number of men in every community who practically say, the ministers will look after that, or the State Temperance Union, or the Committee of Two Hundred, or those who are specially interested in politics will see to it. In that spirit of indifference many and many an otherwise good blow for good citizenship has failed to be struck, and when the hour has passed no one can be blamed except those we call the good people.

No Love for the Multitude

Then there is another little fox that spoils the vineyard, which we may call by the negative term of a lack of love for the multitude. It is akin to this spirit of indifference. It is not easy to love the multitude. It is indeed one of the great qualities which belong to a growing Christian life. It is an exceedingly high quality. The absence of it, however, in a professedly Christian life is not easily excused. It is quite easy to be selfish in our loves. It is very easy for a man to settle down in his own home, make it a beautiful place, improve the property as we say, dress and clothe and feed his children with the best that money can buy; be an exemplary man himself, pay his taxes, tell the truth, love his wife and children, go to church and behave himself generally, and with all that, in the long run, be a man whose affections circle about in a very narrow and belittling circle of life. It is like being selfish in one's grief. One may also be selfish in one's joy. We have no right to live continually in the circle of our immediate friends and relatives. This is the mistake that is made whenever any organization known to men limits its affections, its friendships or its companionships to a select circle. No Christian has any right to complain of individual and personal friendships of a peculiar kind. Christ had his beloved disciple John, but that did not hinder him from having compassion on the multitude and loving the great wide world. Indeed, the presence of a particular friendship or love ought to increase one's compassion for the multitude rather than lessen it. Whenever young men and women enter into an organization of any kind for social life and find it is continually revolving about in that one circle, having a limited number of friends and companions, reluctant to step outside of it for their pleasures or their unselfish giving, it is a pretty good sign that this little fox of selfishness has come into the vineyard. All college or high school fraternities, all religious organizations even, like those of the Endeavor Society, all church organizations, all organizations of any kind in the Masonic or insurance orders, which revolve continually about themselves to the exclusion of a large sympathy and love for all sorts and conditions of men are letting little foxes of selfishness come in, and in the end they will spoil the vineyard.

Selfishness

It is as possible for even a home to become a selfish little circle of private interests as it is for a worldly organization banded together for physical pleasure. A Christian of all persons needs to guard against this little fox. Here we have again our old friend Seneca, who was not what we call a Christian, saying, "No man can live happily who regards himself alone; who turns everything to his own advantage. Thou must live for another if thou wishest to live for thyself." And another philosopher has said: "A man who lives only with himself and for himself is apt to be corrupted by the company he keeps." President King of Oberlin says, "You can make no hopeful fight for your own character without beginning at once the service for others." Walter Scott makes one of his characters say, "Teach self-denial and make this practice pleasurable and you create for the world a destiny more sublime than ever issued from the brain of the wildest dreamer." John William Kaye is on record with this: "Selfishness is suicidal. If it be true that heaven helps those who help themselves, it is no less true that heaven helps those who help others."

There is nothing in all the world which broadens the mind and strengthens the heart and lifts up the soul as a universal sympathy. The church which has no use for foreign missions, which does not see across the ocean as well as across the street, the society which does not embrace in its creed the wide world, is living in a narrow and narrowing circle. The absence of this love of the multitude is one of the things which makes the church powerless, robs it of its enthusiasm, takes from it the great motive for saving men. If we could once capture the ability and the energy of the business men there is nothing which we might not do with an organization which has the centuries behind it and Christ within it. Lacking this element of universal love for universal mankind we remain in the little rut, go through the old forms, sing our hymns with listlessness and offer our prayers sometimes like the heathen, reeling them off at so much a yard with our thoughts upon anything except the great thing for which we are here, which is to save men.

Sensitiveness

There is another little fox in many lives which otherwise would be great, the sensitiveness which takes offense, which says often among church members, like the little boy or girl, "I won't play any longer. I have been hurt in my feelings." One of the last things some people ever learn in the Christian life is to forgive an injury. There are good men and women in this town who, if the crisis arose, would go to the stake and be burned for their faith, who will not forgive an unkind word and who cherish in their hearts for years some slight, real or supposed. These people are sensitive plants. I think they are greatly to be pitied. In a world which is so full of big things it does not pay to linger over little ones, to let them worry or trouble or vex us. What if some one has said something to hurt you? If he has done it with malice he has hurt himself more than from Manila, and now Siam has called another of your specialists, Dr. Edwards."

As Dr. Hayes withdrew, Governor Smith accompanied him to the door, giving him polite messages for the King of Siam. Then returning, he resumed our conversation.

"We are making an effort to give the Manilans pure water," he said, "and are sparing no expense in clearing the water-sheds of the new works of both people and cattle. Then we are improving the roads in the provinces, and in this way Baguio, the health resort, has been made much more accessible and popular."

"I understand that the natives are fond of music," I said, "and that they learn a tune by hearing it once."

"Yes," ejaculated the Governor in a characteristic manner that gives weight to his words, "they do, and they have the love of art, too. Come," he said, "and I will show you some pictures by native artists."

We crossed the hall and paused before a beautiful painting by Luna, the great Filipino artist.

"The one on the opposite wall is by the same painter and that (indicating another) is also by a native artist. Don't you see plainly," asked the Governor, "that this is an artistic people? When they have had the opportunity to see more of the works of the great masters and to study the different schools of art, the Filipinos will come to the front."

In the centre of the hall hung a portrait of the former Queen Regent and on either side pictures of Spanish grantees of the old regime. Recognizing the portrait of General Blanco hanging near that of a famous legislator, Mr. Wright remarked: "Those who fought her battles and those who made her laws, I see."

"Yes," replied the Governor, "and what laws they are! We use them yet. They are too good to discard. As legislators, the Spanish could not be surpassed; but as administrators they were not so good, else they would not have lost the country. We will administrate ourselves," and the General laughed, "but we won't touch their laws. Shall I show you through the palace?" he asked. "I have some rare old tables I think you would appreciate."
